Questions and Answers

T. D., Asheville, N. C. How can the height of a tall building be ascertained without actual measurement?

Very easily if you understand a little trigonometry. Measure a certain distance from the wall of the building. This will serve as a base which, taken in connection with the subtending angles, by a little figuring will give the perpendicular of the triangle, which is the height of the building. If, however, you don't know enough mathematics to do this, measure the shadow of any object of known height and at the same time measure the shadow of the building whose height you desire to find, and then work out the answer by the proportion of ratios. Thus, if a pole six feet high throws a shadow of two feet at noonday, and a building at the same time throws a shadow of fifty feet, the building must be three times as high as the shadow is long, that is, 150 feet.

A. N., Berne, Ind. Please explain 1. John 3: 9. Does it mean that we cannot sin after we are thoroughly converted?

This is a much discussed passage. Christ came to take away sin, and whoso abideth in him, while he does so abide, is free from the dominion of sin. Believers, however, have lapses and fall into sin (I. John 1: 8, 10; I. John 2: 1). Thus it is made clear that while the ideal of the Christian is constant union with Christ, and consequently freedom from sin, he may be betrayed into sin; but with Christ as his propitiation, such lapses are forgiven and sin is not imputed.

R. G. M., Braintree, Mass. Please explain divination.

Divination is an attempt to foretell future events or discover what is secret by other than human means. As the derivation of the word implies, it indicates a belief that omens are sent by divine interposition. Divination has been practiced from the earliest time. The Egyptians and the Greeks had their oracles, the ancient nations of Asia were given to the art, and our own American Indians were strong believers in it. Even in this enlightened day the credulous and gullible are being deceived by fakirs and charlatans and impostors who resort to fraud for gain. There are hundreds of branches of divination being practiced at present, as aeromancy, foretelling by air; arithmomancy, by numbers; bibliomancy, by the Bible; cheiromancy, by the hand; geomancy, by the earth; oneiromancy, by dreams, and all the other "mancys" put forward to deceive the foolish and unwary. Moses expressly prohibited divination (Deut. 18: 11). Saul expelled "those that had familiar spirits," yet he himself was weak enough to consult the famous witch of Endor shortly before the battle in which he fell.

W. L. P., Goldsboro, N. C. What was the first sermon Jesus ever preached?

Luke tells us (Luke 3: 23) that Jesus was about thirty years of age when he began his ministry. During his sojourn in Galilee (ch. 4: v. 14) he had already spoken in the synagogues. Mark 1: 14, 15 mentions these instances, though very briefly, and so also does John 2: 11. His first recorded sermon is mentioned in Luke 4: 16-28. It was on the Sabbath day, and he took his text from the prophet Esaias. He had passed through his forty days' preparatory vigil in the wilderness and was filled with the Spirit, and ready for his work.

W. M. C., Crawford, Ill. 1. What is regarded as the most decisive battle in history? 2. Had Greece and Turkey a war in 1820?

1. The battle of Marathon, 490 B.C., is generally regarded as the most decisive. Eleven thousand Greeks under the great general Miltiades defeated ten times as many Persians, and set an example for bravery unparalleled in the world's history. 2. You probably are thinking of the great Greek war of independence when the Hellenes threw off the hateful yoke. It lasted from 1821 to 1829, and was the culmination of four centuries of Turkish bondage. Almost one-half of the Greeks perished, and their cause seemed hopeless, as the Turks had called the Egyptians to their aid, when England, Russia and France formed a league to help the brave Hellenes. As a result the fleets of the combined forces defeated the Turks and the Egyptians in the Bay of Navarino; the French troops drove the Egyptians from the Peloponnesus, and independence for Greece was won. The poet Byron took a sympathetic part in the war and by his fiery odes helped to sing the Greeks to freedom.

B. W., Brown's Summit, N. C. 1. Did the Lord blot the day on which Job was born from the month of February because the latter cursed his birthday? 2. If not, why has February less days than any other month?

1. There was no February in the time of Job, 1520 B.C. The months, or divisions of time, were not as we have them now. The year of the Jews consisted of twelve lunar months of twenty-nine and thirty days alternately, a thirteenth being from time to time introduced to accommodate it to the sun and seasons. Let it be noted that while Job cursed his birthday,

A BOOK FOR EVERY MEMBER OF THE FAMILY

The Pictorial Life of Christ

Dr. Sandison told you last week: "While THE CHRISTIAN HERALD produces many books, most of them of good quality of workmanship, this is easily the superior of them all. When we secured the right of publication and set about the work of production, several months ago, we brought to the task all the loving care and forethought that we could expend on a book that dealt with the greatest theme in the world—the Life of our Saviour on earth. In the reproduction of Mastroianni's sculptures, we spared no expense. The engravings are the finest that can be produced; the paper of the best quality for work of this class; even the inks were chosen with a care such as we have bestowed on no other work in my recollection, and this applies to both letterpress and illustrations. Its covers are a triumph of the binder's art, beautiful in design, chaste and appropriate in finish."

We will send you, postpaid, The Pictorial Life of Christ, The Christian Herald Almanac for 1913, and The Christian Herald for One Year—all for $3

Twilight Tales. By Margaret E. Sangster

Twilight Tales comes almost as a parting message from one who has been greatly beloved by countless multitudes, and whose contributions for many years in the pages of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD have made her name a household word.

There is a thread of pure gold running through the Twilight Tales from which the reader may divine the author's purpose in writing the book. It is the line of God's protecting love and care which encircles all who trust in him, and the knowledge of which gives to even the smallest detail of everyday life a purpose and significance. She spreads before us the little daily dramas, the heartaches, the disappointments, the sweet surprises and unexpected joys, the separations and the reunions, the cares and consolations of the household, the "journeys that end in lovers' meetings"—all are unrolled like a moving picture, with the vivid action of life itself. Mrs. Sangster has crowded the best heart and soul stories of her whole career into this book. Love, romance, self-denial, ambition and the success that true character commands are here pictured with a fragrant setting of American home-life in town and country. It is a book which will exert a strong spell on the mind of the reader and which creates its own atmosphere of woodlands and old-fashioned gardens and charming American homes, and her men and women are such as we love to meet.

We will send a copy of Twilight Tales, postpaid, The Christian Herald Almanac for 1913, and The Christian Herald for One Year, for only $2

Strange Adventures of Capt. Quinton

We believe The Strange Adventures of Captain Quinton to be one of the most remarkable books of its kind yet published. More than all, it is true. It is not a mere figment of the imagination. The things described really happened. Open the book at any place, and you will find him encountering one or more of innumerable perils, sanguinary experiences which must be read with bated breath, yet not more thrilling in their way than are the exquisite descriptions of treasure-chambers in caves lurid and beautiful as a dream of Arabian Nights; of a wave dance in which tribes of cannibals with an uncanny sense of beauty and rhythm represent with their bodies the ocean dashing high on imaginary coral reefs; of a silvery night spent in tropical tree tops in order to witness the stately dawn-dance of birds of paradise. The very multiplicity of incident is overpowering, but it must be remembered that the experiences of over thirty years are crowded into this book. 496 pages, in illustrated binding.

We will send you, postpaid, The Strange Adventures of Captain Quinton (handsomely bound in cloth), The Christian Herald Almanac for 1913, and The Christian Herald for One full Year—all three for only $2

OR, we will send to old subscribers Free, as a premium, The Strange Adventures of Captain Quinton for sending us one new yearly subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD with $1.50.

The Portrait Life of Lincoln

Here is a book every man and boy will want. It is the greatest collection of Lincoln photographs ever made, the majority of which were part of the great collection of photographs made by Matthew B. Brady during the Civil War. Among the 110 treasures are the first portrait ever taken of Lincoln; photographs of Lincoln taken when his name first passed over the country during the Lincoln-Douglas debates; photographs taken while he was running for United States Senator; during the Missouri Compromise; on the battle ground of Antietam, the bloodiest day in the Civil War; last photograph of Lincoln ever taken; Secret Service photographs of Lincoln's assassins taken on the gallows; photographs of the funeral bier and procession while Lincoln was being taken on his sixteen-hundred-mile journey to Springfield, when twenty-five million people were attending memorial services to the martyred President.

he did not curse his Maker, so why should the Lord drop a day on account of a little weakness in his servant, who, despite his great suffering, never uttered any reproach against the Author of his being? 2. Our months as at present, we have from the Romans. With those people February had originally twenty-nine days in an ordinary year, but when the Roman Senate decreed that the eighth month should bear the name of Augustus, a day was taken from February and given to August, which had then only thirty, that it might not be inferior to July, named in honor of Julius Cæsar.

R. R. T., Preston, Kan. 1. In the 119th Psalm what do the different headings, Aleph, Beth, etc., signify? 2. Why is it that quotation marks were never used in the Bible as well as question marks?

1. The words Aleph, Beth, Gimel, etc., are the names of the Hebrew letters. The 119th Psalm is an acrostic. It has twenty-two divisions of eight verses each. The first word of each verse of each division begins with the same letter of the Hebrew alphabet, the verses of the first division with Aleph, those of the second division with Beth, and so on. 2. The quotation mark is a more recent sign in writing and printing than the interrogation point. It was introduced into English typography from France about 1680, nearly seventy years after the King James Version was printed. Up to that time a quotation was marked by the use of a capital letter, following a comma. This usage, followed in the King James Version, has not been changed in the later revisions, probably, in part, because there is in many cases a doubt as to where the quotation begins and ends.

C. R., Duluth, Minn. What is meant by Anglophobia?

Anglophobia is intense hatred of England and all things English. It is a disease which has attacked many countries, and some with great virulence. The United States had an experience of it. Germany had it severely at the time of the Boer War, 1899-1901, but Russia had it worst of all during the Russo-Japanese War, because nearly all Russians then believed that Japan was but a mere catspaw of England.

Miscellaneous

M. H., Greenwich, N. Y. All of Christ's disciples were Jews.

Mrs. D. W. P., Covington, Ga. There is no such passage in the Bible.

Constant Reader, Millerstown, Pa. One who assists another to desecrate the Lord's Day is responsible, as though he himself were the desecrator. There is to be considered the question whether the work you mention was not one of necessity, in which case it cannot be regarded as desecration. We should be careful of judging others.

E. P., Summerville, Mass. 1. There is no mention of women in Acts 2: 16-18, but this does not necessarily imply their exclusion. There are many passages in the New Testament which show that godly women had a good share in the activities of the early church, but it was not customary for them to teach or preach (see Acts 16: 40; 17: 12; 17: 34, etc.). 2. See I. Peter 3: 5, 6; Acts 2: 5.

S. R. R., Edgar, Ill. Paul's suggestion in I. Tim. 5: 11 was with relation to the choice of suitable women for membership on the prehytery rolls. He drew the line at light-headed, worldly-minded persons whose fondness for pleasure and society was pronounced and who were more likely to seek marriage again than to devote themselves wholly to the service of the church. Second marriages he regarded with disfavor. Moreover, widowed prebyteresses, when taking their vows, engaged to remain single because the interests of the church made this desirable.

Mrs. R. C. H., Edna, Ark. 1. The passage in Rev. 20 describes the binding of Satan. The antichristian kingdom, Satan's last effort, is utterly destroyed, and his power on earth is ended for a thousand years. Verses 5, 6, 7, of the same chapter have already been discussed in THE MAIL-BAG. Many eminent authorities have written on this chapter and there is a wide variety of interpretations. 2. The "gift of tongues" belonged to the apostolic age. There are sects, however, who claim that it is given in our own times. The divine power is not shortened, but it is well to beware of fanaticism and of emotional hysteria. God's messages to man are never unintelligible to those for whom they are intended, and any so-called message, which is utterly incomprehensible, should be seriously doubted.

The Best of All Almanacs

To-day I received the 1913 copy of your Almanac. I want to say that it is the best bundle of information I have ever had a chance to handle. And there is not any thing that I know of that affords me more pleasure to read, outside of the Book itself, than THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. With best wishes, and may God speed you in your efforts, I am,

TAMING THE MOROS OF MINDANAO

THE MORO AS A FACTOR FOR CONSIDERATION IN CONNECTION WITH THE PHILIPPINE SELF-GOVERNMENT BILL NOW BEFORE CONGRESS

BY FREDERICK SIMPICH, United States Consular Service

HERE'S a naked wild man down in tropic Sulu land, a fanatic with a wavy-bladed "kris" and a big shield, on whom Uncle Sam is trying the Golden Rule. The Moro this fierce person is called, and he roams the jungle isle of Mindanao—way down under the Southern Cross, hard by Borneo. We got him with the Filipinos, in 1898. And with him we got a Moslem problem, a problem like Italy has found in Tripoli, and England in India and Egypt. Now this conflict of Cross and Crescent is an old story in the East—as old as the Crusades of course; but when Uncle Sam got the Moro he met it for the first time. He knew the Indian and negro; he had excluded Chinese and assimilated hordes from the south of Europe. But a real dyed-in-the-beard disciple of Islam, a pilgrim to Mecca who spurns pork and counts it glory to slay a Christian—well, this indeed was a new problem to Uncle Sam. Just how well his firm, fair policy in Mindanao is solving it is what I want to tell you. Be it known first of all that this notorious Moro is no ordinary Oriental, weak, servile and fawning. Unlike the Hindus, the Malays and Filipinos, he bowed not readily to conquerors from the Western world. Fourteen years ago, when we took the Moro to our national bosom as an adopted child, we quickly saw that he was the bad boy of the whole Philippine family. We found him just as savage, warlike and unconquered as when Magellan discovered him—and perished for the achievement—nearly four centuries before. Proud, cruel and cunning, despising cowardice, robust and agile, sober, audacious and vindictive, small wonder adjacent tribes feared him, and that his fame as a pirate, a butcher and slaver had spread throughout the East. Shortly before Admiral Dewey took Manila, a Spanish lieutenant was sent by his government under a flag of truce with a message to the sultan at Jolo. The sultan's warriors waylaid the young Spaniard, caught him, cut off his right hand, and sent him back maimed for life to show their contempt for the theoretical rule of Spain. From Luzon to Thursday Island the word "Moro" stood for cruelty and bloodshed. For two hundred and fifty years these fanatics held undisputed sway, robbing, killing and taking slaves at will. Not a coast town in the Philippine group had escaped their ravages, and a Spanish priest was looked on as a prize captive. Thousands of boys and girls were stolen and forced into slavery.

The Home of the Sultan of Jolo and His Numerous Wives

It was not till about the time of our Civil War that the Spaniards, by bringing out some twenty small steam gunboats from Europe, were able even to confine the Moros to their own island. To this day northern island natives speak with dread of the Moros, and in many coast towns one may see old stone forts, built long ago to repel Moro raids. Every successive governor general from Madrid took his outdoor sport campaigning against the Moros, but until the island was occupied by United States troops in 1898 they had not been really subdued.

Such were the Moros when Uncle Sam took the contract for their pacification and uplift. And derisive enough were the comments of many British and German papers. Sad, sudden and sickening failure was freely predicted; "for," said these journals, "what do the Yankees know of the Oriental, or of ruling him?" Hark now, for the answer. To-day in Mindanao vast farms of hemp and cocoanuts flourish in the fertile valleys; scores of contented Moros are on Yankee payrolls, and even our most captious critics, the British cousins, admit that Yankee rule in Mindanao has been a glad surprise to the civilized world. First under General Wood, then under Bliss, Hoyt and Pershing, the taming of the Moros and the trial of the Golden Rule has gone on. In the beginning blood flowed, and many a good American sacrificed his life to the cause of civilization in the jungles of this historic isle. There was ill-timed criticism, too, of "wanton slaughter" from stay-at-homes who knew nothing of Mindanao's dark ways, and who did not realize that only Uncle Sam's fair, firm policy could bring peace and progress quickly. If woman daubed on man's warpaint, took man's weapon, and fought beside man against the Americans, who was to be blamed if she was hurt? Should not a lone sentry shoot to save himself from the "juramentado," the fanatic who vows to die shedding Christian blood that he may go at once to the paradise of Allah? The hardest job was to make the Moro trust us. To his warped mind, drilled through generations to look on all Christians as his born enemies, the Golden Rule was not easy to grasp. Why should the "Americanos" keep faith, pay real cash for work done, and treat their late enemies with kindness? Here truly was an odd race, unlike the combative Spaniards! Slowly the change came. The greatest ordeal came when we asked the Moro to give up his arms. On their village anvils they hammer out these graceful weapons—krises, daggers and spears—inlaying the blades with silver and shaping beautiful handles of ivory. Every boy over sixteen wore a weapon; it was a part of his dress, the sign of manhood. But gradually, by precept, kindness, and non-interference with their Moslem rites, our army officers won the confidence of the Moros. One officer at least, Major Finley, won their affection. When he left they bestowed on him the title of Sultan, and urged upon him to petition Uncle Sam not to forsake his Moro wards—not to turn them over to the rule of the north island Tagalogs and Visayans.

A Typical Moro Fishing Village on the Coast of Mindanao

To-day these quondam pirates prefer labor to loot; they dive for pearls, weave cloth, manufacture cane furniture, grow tree cotton, hemp and cocoanuts. Under American direction they have learned to build bridges, docks and wharves. Trade is growing fast, and the Moro has caught the commercial spirit of the Americans, Europeans, Chinese, and the more advanced island pagans, who ply their vocations about him. Schools and courts are established, reasonable taxes taken, and justice is quick, direct and effective. In short, Yankee uplift is making a man of the Moro.

Now comes the reason for this description of the nation's Moro wards. Congressman Jones, who says the Filipinos should be free, has presented a bill in our national legislature providing that after eight years the Filipinos may slip off the Yankee yoke. This means free Moros, too. You know what the Moro was—for ages. You can easily imagine what he might again quickly become, were the restraining influence of Uncle Sam's gloved fist removed. The old régime of piracy and bloodshed would return. The Filipino was never born—nor ever will be—who can rule the Moro. It would undo all our good work in Mindanao—it would be a singularly cruel act towards the Filipinos themselves—were we to grant them freedom and force on them the responsibility of Moro control. So when the Jones Bill is discussed, the Moro must be taken into consideration.

A "Datto" or Petty Moro Village Chief

A Moro Built Road and Bridge in Mindanao

I write this as one who knows the Filipinos—who has enjoyed their friendship and who hopes for their ultimate independence. But no American can know the Moro well. Child of the Dyaks of Borneo, converted by some wandering Arab long ago, mysterious and superstitious as the desert Bedouin, the Moro is and must long remain the unknown Moslem quantity in our Philippine problem. Our plan was different from any the world had ever seen tried on a savage race, modeled largely after that of the British; but guided by their years of experience and the mistakes they have made and learned to correct, we have gone far in reclaiming the Moro. Ours is not a government that enters in any way into the religious life of its people either at home or abroad. But it has taught to these wild men of yesterday the Golden Rule—the foundation of peace, progress and human happiness.

Uncle Sam's application of this rule has done more for these savages—these wild men—in fourteen years than Spain's relentless campaigns accomplished in four centuries. If we abandon the islands to Tagalog rule—and to-day it seems to many that it would be abandonment—the Moros, with an awakening of the spirit of the past, will fall upon the other islanders as in the old days, and all our years of work, our lives and money spent will have been in vain. Even when that day shall come when the islands are fitted by development for self-rule we shall have to keep Mindanao under control unless that time is still in the far distant future.

AMBASSADOR REID SUCCUMBS AT HIS POST IN LONDON

WHITELAW REID, American Ambassador to Great Britain since 1905, died at his London residence, Dorchester House, on December 15. For about a year previous to his death Mr. Reid had not enjoyed the best of health, but his final illness was of only two weeks' duration and his death was a great blow to both England and America. Sir William Osler, Sir Thomas Barlow, physician to the king, and Dr. William Hale White were in attendance at the time of the ambassador's death. Mr. Reid's only son, the present managing editor of the New York Tribune, was hastening to England when he was notified by wireless of his father's death.

The press of the two great English-speaking nations joined in the highest tributes of praise of Mr. Reid's personal character and attainments and public services. A precedent was established when King George himself sent the cablegram which announced to President Taft the death of the ambassador. He expressed his sincere grief for the loss of a warm personal friend and tendered his condolences to Mrs. Reid and to the American people.

An impressive memorial service was held in Westminster Abbey on the Friday following Ambassador Reid's death. At this service, which was officially attended by the representatives of all the governments who have ambassadors at the Court of St. James, the highest tributes were paid to the memory of the deceased American diplomat. Premier Asquith, in the House of Commons, spoke in the highest terms of the late ambassador and proposed to the House that it approve the detachment of a battleship to bring his remains to America.

Whitelaw Reid was born in Xenia, Ohio, on October 27, 1837. He received his early education in the academy of the town, and his collegiate course at Miami University. Immediately after his graduation he became a schoolmaster, but within a year the profession which was to be his for life—journalism—called him. He took charge of a newspaper in his home town and made it a success. He became active in the affairs of the newly formed Republican party, and the years of his life up to the beginning of the Civil War were filled by successful newspaper work and political activities. Just after Lincoln's election to the Presidency, Mr. Reid went to Columbus, the Ohio State capital, and took up the work of a political correspondent. He so distinguished himself that, at the outbreak of the Civil War, he was enabled to go forward with the command of George B. McClellan, then a captain in the regular army, as a war correspondent. Then began over his pen name of "Agate" a series of the most brilliant letters in the history of American war correspondence. Straight on through the fateful struggle to the climax at Appomattox, Mr. Reid followed the movements of the troops in that great war.

The Late Whitelaw Reid

Who died at his post in London, England

Immediately at its close he became a political correspondent at Washington. There he met Horace Greeley, the editor of the New York Tribune, whom he had admired for many years. Shortly after this Mr. Greeley invited the young journalist to join the staff of the great New York daily, but as he felt other duties to be more pressing Mr. Reid reluctantly refused.

A few years later the impeachment of President Johnson once more took Mr. Reid to Washington. There he again came in contact with Mr. Greeley, and this time the offer of a position, second only to that of the editor himself, on the Tribune brought the young journalist to New York. His career there was one of continued success up to the time of Mr. Greeley's death. Then Mr. Reid assumed chief command and there followed more years of success and hard work as publisher and editor. His activities during these years would almost include an epitome of the political history of the United States.

In 1877 he was offered the post of ambassador to Germany to succeed his friend Bayard Taylor, but this he refused. A few years later, in 1881, he accepted the appointment of ambassador to France and there did splendid service through rather trying years of his country's commercial development. In 1897 he was America's special ambassador at the Diamond Jubilee of Queen Victoria, and a year later he was one of the five American commissioners appointed by President McKinley to make peace with Spain. After several years of the life of a leading newspaper editor and publicist he was appointed special ambassador at the coronation of King Edward VII.

The success and popularity which had attended all his diplomatic missions was such as to mark him for appointment to the post which is, by common consent, regarded as the highest in the foreign service of the United States. So to this place as ambassador at the Court of St. James he was appointed in 1905 by President Roosevelt.

Socially, politically, and as a scholar Mr. Reid has reflected credit upon the country which sent him as its representative to the world's greatest capital. Universities all over the world have recognized his scholarship and ability by giving him honorary degrees. A list of his books and shorter literary efforts would fill almost a column of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

I SHALL be very glad in similar circumstances to organize a thousand Congregational churches."

Bishop Samuel Fallows, of the Reformed Episcopal Church, had gone to a small town in North Dakota to look after the organization of a church which he had supposed would become a part of his own denomination. Arriving on the field, however, he found that the preference of the majority of those who were to be members was for a Congregational Church, and the good bishop took the first steps towards bringing the new church into affiliation with that denomination. From the platform of the second quadrennial council of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, meeting at Chicago December 3-9, he made the assertion quoted above: "I shall be glad in similar circumstances to organize a thousand Congregational churches."

That remark and the volume of the applause which greeted it indicated the spirit of the gathering of the 350 delegates who represented eighteen million Christians, nearly the whole of American Protestantism, and who during these seven days heard reports and laid plans looking to a still closer kind of co-operation in the work of the kingdom of the Saviour. Incidentally that occurrence also illustrates a growing conviction on the part of Federation workers that it is usually not expedient to ignore denominational connection and supervision. It seems to have been demonstrated that the so-called "union church" is not so apt to prosper as a church organized in connection with an established denomination. In many ways, by its literature, its supervision, its "momentum," the denomination safeguards and strengthens the individual church. The plan followed when possible by the Federation experts is that adopted in the Dakota community referred to, where the denomination having the greatest number of representatives was given the oversight of the new congregation. Many cases are on record where this plan for preventing the "overlapping" of denominational activities has worked most happily.

The whole convention at Chicago was marked with delightful unity and fraternity. The delegates emphasized the fact that the leaders of Christ's armies are insisting less and less upon points of creed which separate them from one another and are uniting in active service for the salvation of the world. Special stress was laid upon social service, the Council reiterating its belief that the church is called upon to right the wrongs of society and seek the welfare not only of men's souls but of their minds and bodies. But the Federation stands solidly for the spiritual realities and the old Gospel notion of salvation. In its quadrennial report the executive committee states that "the Federation witnesses to the truth that the only enduring hope for the salvation, progress and perfection of mankind, in this and in all lands, is to be found in faith in, and obedience to, Jesus Christ as the divine Saviour. He is the Head of the Church Universal which is his body; and to it, in all its members, he has entrusted the Gospel of the redeeming grace of God." The evangelistic committee, of which Dr. William H. Roberts is chairman, also offered a comprehensive and clear-cut statement of principles which was adopted by the council.

By previous arrangement it was determined that the president of the council elected to succeed Bishop E. R. Hendrix should be a member of the Baptist Church. The representatives of that denomination nominated Dr. Shailer Mathews, dean of the Chicago University Divinity School, to the office, and he was chosen president by acclamation. The addresses of both the retiring and incoming presidents were most happy. Dr. Charles S. Macfarland was reappointed secretary of the council.

Among the important decisions of the Chicago session were the following: A commission on religious education was provided for with the understanding that it should become a definitely organized department. The report of the committee on week-day instruction was adopted, including the recommendations that wherever public sentiment warrants such a course, the public schools should be closed for half a day for the purpose of allowing the children to attend instruction in religion in their own churches, and that where this is not feasible, the churches should provide at least one hour of religious instruction each week after school time on a week day. The committee on foreign missions was, upon its own recommendation, directed to co-operate with the Foreign Missions Conference of North America. Urgent recommendations were made concerning the safeguarding of the family, the observance of the Lord's Day, the provision of one day's rest in seven for industrial workers. Advanced stand was also taken on the whole labor situation; an office of the council was directed to be established at Washington; steps were taken to organize a World League of Peace.

Among the striking addresses delivered during the council were those of Dr. James A. MacDonald, editor of the Toronto Globe; Bishop Francis J. McConnell; Dr. Walter Laidlaw; Dr. W. F. Sheridan, Professor Walter Rauschenbusch; Professor Edward A. Steiner, and Governor Thomas R. Marshall, Vice-President elect of the United States.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE PILGRIMAGE TO ALBANY

NEW YORK has witnessed many strange sights and has become so accustomed to the extraordinary that the most remarkable happenings are taken rather as a matter of course. Nevertheless, blasé and apathetic as the big city has become, it was compelled to sit up and take notice on the morning of December 16 when thirty-four woman suffrage crusaders started on a fifteen days' march to Albany, carrying a message for the Hon. William Sulzer, the new governor of New York State, to remind that official of some pre-election promises he made on the subject of votes for women.

The little band of pilgrims presented a brave appearance as they took up the march in the direction of the State capitol. There was elasticity in their steps and determination in their eyes, as they set out with their long staves and scrips and marching paraphernalia.

These women were in deadly earnest; they were really making sacrifices for the cause in which they believe; they were undergoing inconvenience and fatigue and other physical deprivations; for a march of over one hundred and forty miles lay before them under a wintry sky, and moreover, they had to bear the taunts and jeers, the contumely and ridicule of the crowds.

Banners, transparencies, streamers, sashes were in evidence everywhere, all bearing mottoes appropriate to the occasion, as "Votes for Women," "Men, Vote for Women in 1915," "First Aid Is All Right for Bruises, but Nothing Will Save Us but Votes for All," "Equal Rights for All," etc. An advance guard or official scout was chosen, who rode in an automobile and dashed ahead now and again to announce the approach of the marchers as well as to reconnoiter the road. The forces were marshaled by General Rosalie Gardner Jones, and the other officers in charge were Colonel Ida Craft, Surgeon General Lavinia Dock, Captain Jessie Hardy Stubbs and Lieutenant Sybil Wilbur. With flying colors and a blare of trumpets, tin horns, drums and automobile sirens, they set off upon their way through the towns and valleys which Washington Irving made immortal. Indeed, had old Rip Van Winkle himself once more appeared, he would not have caused more surprise among some of the residents of these districts than did the valiant suffragists as they proudly plodded on their way.

But alas! they had reached far short of Albany when many deserted the ranks, not through desire but by compulsion. The spirit was willing but the flesh was weak, and so the weak ones "fell by the wayside," that is to say, they abandoned the march even before it was well begun. At the end of the first day's tramp, which brought the remnant to Irvington-on-the-Hudson, some twenty-one miles from the metropolis, only seven were left to still cry "On to Albany!" These remaining enthusiasts, undaunted and undismayed, gripped their staves afresh in the bracing morning air of the following day and registered a silent vow to persevere on the journey until their eyes beheld the dome of the capitol flashing in the sunlight of a new year, which they hope will be a presage of much success for their cause.

THE BIBLE IN ROYAL HOMES

—KING GEORGE OF ENGLAND, according to a trustworthy correspondent, reads a chapter of the Bible every day and has done so for thirty-two years, in performance of a promise made to his mother. Emperor William of Germany, as we stated not long ago, is a regular reader of the Word. These Bible-loving rulers set a good example to their people.

The New Year and Its Duties

AT THE beginning of a new year, many of the letters we receive from our readers are filled with expressions of hearty appreciation and with the kindest of wishes. This is in accordance with the pleasing annual custom of the members of the great CHRISTIAN HERALD Family Circle. We cordially reciprocate these good wishes and friendly salutations. Doubtless there are thousands of those good friends who, in their petitions, remember this journal and its work for Christianity and humanity. We value such spiritual co-operation far more than we can express, for to us it is both reinforcement and inspiration.

Knowing that a Divine Hand guides the helm, we can begin with courage and confidence the New Year, assured that to those who trust in God and do his will, all good things will come to pass. This does not mean, however, that we should seek no personal share in such development. On the contrary, knowing that "God loves to be helped," we should strive with all our energies to bring about such results in the coming months as will be pleasing to Him. We see before us duties which He is calling us to perform and to which we ought to address ourselves with energy and zeal. Our cities need a moral cleansing; corruptionists must be brought to book; social evils must be grappled with and overcome; childhood must be protected from cruel exploitation, which robs it of its birthright and makes slaves of hundreds of thousands of helpless little ones. Purely denominational affairs should not so engross our churches as to prevent them from uniting in a great crusade against such crying evils as we have indicated. If the Christian churches of America, the various associations of Christian workers and the body of evangelists, stood shoulder to shoulder in the fight against sin, social vice, social corruption and child slavery, they could do much toward making the new year a memorable one for civic, State and national righteousness. The nation's eyes must be opened to these evils, and the national consciousness roused for their redress.

So there is plenty of work for all—some of it at long range and more of it near at hand; and if we would help to make the year happy and successful, we must each of us do our share. It is the duty that lies nearest to us that is the most important to the majority, and according as we do that duty faithfully, so shall be our satisfaction and our reward.

We invite every one of our readers to co-operate with us in making 1913 a year of signal service, of progress and of spiritual and material usefulness. With God's help, it may be made a year in which the triumphs will outweigh the trials, the joys the sorrows. And we are hoping that it may be a notable year in the reinforcement of the great army of good people who work in conjunction with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. With this end in view, many of our friends are bringing in new additions to our Family Circle, and many more will doubtless follow. We look forward to that Circle becoming in 1913 a greater spiritual aggregation than it has ever been in the past, and we confidently believe that its efforts, under divine direction, will be productive of great blessing.

A Great Journalist Gone

IN THE death of Whitelaw Reid there has passed away the last of that brilliant group whose genius for nearly half a century made American journalism one of the greatest influences in our nation's progress. Whitelaw Reid had a remarkable and varied career. Teacher, soldier, war correspondent, author, editor, diplomatist—in each and all he showed himself possessed of unusual qualities. His rare powers of observation and description were marked by a sane common sense which served him well throughout a long and active life. Mr. Greeley proved his appreciation of Whitelaw Reid's many-sided genius when he chose him as his successor on the Tribune—a selection the wisdom of which his later career abundantly justified. In many ways he did valuable service to the nation, and his appointments as minister to France, and afterwards as ambassador to Great Britain, were the logical recognition of this fact. Active in many national campaigns, he never allowed himself to descend to mere partizanship. His whole public career was marked by a dignity that is almost unique in politics nowadays. He was more of the scholarly author and careful, conservative editor than the politician, and the encomiums he won abroad were more largely due to his brilliant intellectuality, to his broad grasp of international problems, and to the distinguished and genial type of Americanism he personally represented, than to any other cause. At home he will always be remembered as a sincere worker for the nation's welfare, and one who was an honor to the great profession to which he especially belonged.

The Coal Trust Decision

BY a decision of the United States Supreme Court in the case of the coal-carrying railroads, just handed down, the so-called 65 per cent. contracts with independent dealers are annulled and the dissolution is ordered of railroad control of the Temple Iron Company, a concern which the principal railroads and the coal companies utilized to strangle competition in the anthracite fields in 1898. The court, however, did not sustain the government's general charge, made against all the railroads concerned, of conspiracy and violation of the Anti-Trust Law, and it dismissed the charges against minor companies among the coal-carrying roads. In other words, it drew a sharp distinction between agreements made by the same parties and for the same purpose at different times, and under different conditions, basing its decision on the character and object of the agreements themselves. It estahlished the principle that one coal combine may be for legitimate purposes and therefore lawful, and another combine for doubtful or illegitimate ends and hence unlawful, thus practically giving to the law a "reasonable interpretation." While the government's charge of a general combination has not been established, still a certain measure of relief from oppressive and abnormal practices is afforded. It was shown that the particular combination ruled against was made, not for extending trade legitimately, but to prevent competitors from enlarging their coal business. This was the interpretation put upon the combination preventing the construction of the New York, Wyoming and Western Railroad, which was to carry competing coal. As to the 65 per cent. contracts which have been voided by the court, they were agreements under which 32 "independents" bound themselves to sell their product to the dependents in the combination, who were to pay them 65 per cent. of the average market prices at tide-water. As this combination controlled 87 per cent. and marketed 70 per cent. of all the anthracite, its influence on prices was practically unlimited. There are still other local combinations with which the government may deal later, but meanwhile the situation has not seriously disturbed the equanimity of the coal trade, since it leaves it free to make normal contracts in the usual way when competition gets too severe. There is another investigation to begin shortly which, it is hoped, will strike at the root of the matter, in an effort to provide some relief for the public from excessive prices in future.

The Unchanging Christ

LIFE in this world presents a vast panorama of change. Generations of men are coming and going, like waves that roll in upon the shore, are broken up into spray, and receding leave scarcely a trace on the sands of the beach. No product of man's head or heart or hand is able to withstand the ravages of time. Change and decay in all around we see. One solitary figure stands towering o'er the wreck of time: the Lord, Christ Jesus the Crucified. It is thousands of years ago—a long yesterday—since men heard of him. Abraham rejoiced to see his day; and before Abraham was, he is. He is the eternal God, and men have been directed to him as their Saviour, foreordained for that purpose before the foundation of the world. He is the same to-day: the omnipotent God and the kind Friend. His Word is the same to-day as in the days of his flesh, when Pharisees and Sadducees quailed before the majesty of his utterance, and publicans and sinners solaced their hearts from his comforting teaching. His redeeming work is to-day the one blessed hope of our race. We need this never-changing Jesus to-day, just as our fathers needed him. Our advances in culture, learning, art, our great discoveries, have not changed our relations to God, because they have not made us different beings. We are still sinners, and our salvation from sin and its curse must come from God. We could afford to lose much of what we have to-day, yea, we could do without all, if we only have Jesus. All else is dross and dung without him. Blessed fact this, that Jesus is to-day! He will be to-morrow. Suns will rise and set, and while time lasts each day will bring us its burden of labor and sorrow. The future is full of uncertainty; for all our worldly securities may fail us in the hour of need. Jesus, however, will abide. With every morning that will dawn on our perplexities his mercies to us will be renewed. Would we forsake Jesus?

Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life. And we believe and are sure that thou art that Christ, the Son of the living God. We pray thee, surround us with thy protecting grace amid the vicissitudes of this transient life. Let all endeavors during this year be begun in thee, subject to thy approval. Then bless our feeble efforts for our increase in faith and every Christian virtue, and whether we live or die, preserve our souls in every danger, O thou who changest not, Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, and to-day, and forever. Amen.

—IN HIS BOOK on South America, Mr. Bryce, the British ambassador, concludes that the Roman Catholic Communion in that country has lost its hold on the conscience and thought of the best class of people. There are large masses of the native Indian population who require religious ministration. The religious abandonment of the country, the Churchman observes, is "intolerable."

Fatal Battle of Strikers

TWO HUNDRED strikers and sympathizers on the coal piers of the Erie and New York and Susquehanna Railroads at Edgewater, N. J., over the river from upper New York City, assembled on the heights above the dock with guns concealed. When the ferryboat Edgewater landed with 150 strike-breakers aboard, the strikers, most of them foreigners, ran down the hill like savages with guns in their hands and shot into the crowd of railroad detectives and strike-breakers, killing two and seriously wounding more than a score. Captain A. J. Craw, commanding the police squad, faced the charge of the strikers, and his body was riddled with bullets. As he lay dying a frenzied rioter emptied a double-barreled shotgun into his body. Clarence Mallory, his assistant, who fought bravely, was also killed. Six other policemen fell badly wounded. The strikers then fired into the strike-breakers on the ferryboat, and wounded many of them. Mayor Clahan called on Sheriff Conklin for help, and the latter swore in special deputies, who took possession of the bluffs and railroad yards, and not only dispersed the mob, but arrested and put in jail the ringleaders of the murderous assault. The sheriff posted notices in many languages forbidding the assembling of strikers on the streets, ordering all saloons closed, and immediately restored law and order. The men may or may not have had grievances against the railroad companies; they may or may not have had a cause for striking, which was their privilege in this free land. This is certain: they had no right to undertake forcibly to prevent other men from taking their places, which had been voluntarily surrendered; and when they used their guns against the strike-breakers and killed them, they were murderers before the law of God and men, and their leaders should have long terms in prison, and all engaged in the murderous riot should be punished in some way or other. We welcome foreigners to our shores from every land who want to obey our laws and become good citizens, and with our system of popular education and the influence of our Christian churches we are doing wonderfully well in Americanizing our immigrants, but the barbarism of the strikers at Edgewater cannot be apologized for nor tolerated. The prompt action of the mayor and sheriff had much to do in preventing further bloodshed, and it will save much trouble in the future if the grand jury and prosecuting attorneys push to speedy trial and punishment the guilty murderers. Meanwhile it will be proper for the companies to inquire calmly into the question as to whether any responsibility for the industrial difficulties rests upon them. The prophet said of the slayers:

Seeks Pearl Forty Years

THERE is a little old man in a faded gray suit and a battered brown derby hat in South Street, New York City, who is the champion oyster-opener. He has been at his job through the seasons of forty years. From the time he began this business he has had the idea that he was to find in a shell a pearl so valuable as to furnish him provision for a rainy day. For forty years he has carefully watched every shell he has opened, and has told his intimate friends of his expectation of discovering his prize. He has had a delusion, almost that of a crank, but a pleasant one. The instinct of hope is so strong in the human heart that almost everybody expects to find a pearl in his oystershell. This man in his humble occupation found a pearl in his oyster every day in the wages he earned or the profit he made, and if he be a man of character, or if he has supported a family, he has done much better for himself and the world than if he had found the valuable pearl. The steady occupations of life, however humble, have a better provision in them for a rainy day than the accidents of fortune, which are as scarce as jewels in the oysters of a restaurant. It would be well if the singleness of purpose manifested by this oyster-opener in searching for the jewel for forty years might be copied in the search of the soul for the pearl of great price, as illustrated in the parable:

When he had found one pearl of great price, went and sold all that he had and bought it. (Matt. 13: 46.)

Dickinson College Hazers Punished

THE Bible and Newspaper last week, in its account of the "Disgraceful College Hazing," mentioned the fact that the college authorities were busy hunting for the students guilty of the act. That they have been successful in discovering and punishing the hazers is learned by a letter sent to this paper by Rev. B. B. Loomis, of Carlisle, Pa., containing a note addressed to the papers by Dr. J. H. Morgan, dean of Dickinson College, from which we take the following quotation: "Hazing is never countenanced by the college authorities—in fact, is severely condemned and uniformly punished when discovered. It is generally difficult, however, to discover those guilty of hazing, as shown by the fact that for years the United States Government, with all its authority at West Point and Annapolis, was unable to stamp out serious hazing. In this case, however, partly because of the general condemnation of the student body, the facts have been discovered, and six students who took part in the hazing have been suspended from the college, some of whom will probably never be reinstated. We cannot hope as a college to escape the natural consequences of the unfortunate act of some of our students, even though they be a small minority, and we do not complain when a great newspaper publishes the facts. In justice to the college, however, we now feel that we may fairly ask that equal publicity be given the fact that the guilty parties have been ferreted out and punished." Such prompt action on the part of the authorities maintains the reputation of the college, and is likely to make such occurrences less frequent in the future. It also verifies the statement that Though hand join in hand, the wicked shall not be unpunished. (Prov. 11:21.)

Rug Five Hundred Years Old

ONE thousand stitches to the square inch; size, six feet two inches by five feet two inches; age, 504 years; value, $25,000; are some of the facts about a Hebrew prayer-rug, which is part of a $1,200,000 collection in New York. This rug was used in the synagogue at Cordova, Spain. Four brothers spent twenty-five years perfecting this article. On this rug the high priest knelt twice daily for forty years, and here he met his death when the temple was sacked in 1548. In preparing the furnishings for the tabernacle, Moses speaks of the artists endowed for the work:

Of the weaver, and of those that devise cunning work. (Ex. 35:35.)

Judge Imposes Odd Sentence

MUNICIPAL JUDGE HOPKINS of Chicago said to his bailiff the other day, as a man charged with intoxication was brought before him: "Get a mirror and make this man take a good look at himself." The officer obeyed, and when the poor fellow, with bloated face and bloodshot eyes, looked into the glass an expression of greater horror came over him, and he asked the privilege of taking a Turkish bath. "Hang that mirror back of the rail and let it stay there," ordered the judge. "I want every man like this to be compelled to look at himself when he is brought to the bar of this court. I should like to have a big mirror put just outside of each cell also. If these men could see themselves as they are it would cure half of them." There was a deep philosophy in the sentence of Judge Hopkins. There is also a theological truth suggested by it: the necessity of seeing oneself; rigid self-examination for the discovery of sin. The first step in the reformation of a life or the regeneration of a soul is to see the spirit's face made ugly by the fingerprints of sin. If people are not made to see and abhor their sins there is no likelihood that there will be any desire or determination to reform. Other persons than the poor drunken prisoner could look into the mirror at themselves to advantage. Some men and women who have beautiful, healthy faces and occupy position in most respectable society, if they were to look into the Gospel mirror closely enough, might discover in some habit an ugly wound, or in some cherished sin a disfiguring blemish, causing the beholder anything but self-congratulation. A true vision of God in the mirror is likely to induce a vision of sin in self, as ugly as the bloated face of the prisoner at the bar. The prophet refers to this vision of self after a look at God when he says:

Woe is me! for I am undone, because I am a man of unclean lips, and dwell in the midst of a people of unclean lips; for mine eyes have seen the King, the Lord of hosts. (Isa. 6: 5).

Aged Criminal Gives Advice

NEARLY a score of young men, all under twenty years of age, were awaiting sentence in a New York court the other day, and with them stood an old man, hardened with crime, to receive his punishment. The young criminals laughed and jeered at the old man in his predicament. He turned seriously toward them and said: "I have spent thirty years of my life in prison, and now that I am down and out, you young fools taunt me with my age. I am no preacher, but I want to tell you that crime does not pay. You should thank God that you are not as old as I am, and that there is still some hope for you." There was shame in the faces of the young men, and silence except the bitter sobbing of one of their number, a lad of sixteen. What an eloquent sermon out of such a sad experience! It is to be hoped it did some good. If the old man had in the beginning of life followed the advice he gave the young men, his gray hairs would have been a crown of glory instead of shame.

The hoary head is a crown of glory, if it be found in the way of righteousness. (Prov. 16: 31.)

New Forces in an Old World

A New Year Sermon

by Pastor Charles M. Sheldon

TEXT: "Therefore if any man is in Christ, he is a new creature: old things are passed away; behold, all things are become new." II. Cor. 5: 17

LET us take a brief survey of the world at the beginning of the new year. As we look out upon it we are able to say truthfully that it is a better world each year. Christianity has been tested by the ages. Jesus said that if he were lifted up he would draw all men unto himself, and history is proving the truth of his prophecy.

It is worth while to consider some of the new things which are in the world now, due to the force of Christianity, which were not here when Jesus was born. The list is too large to be given entirely, but in part it is as follows: The abolition of slavery; the emancipation of women; the organization of Christianity into practical forms like churches, young people's societies, Christian associations, etc.; the rise of temperance societies, missionary societies, and all philanthropical societies organized therefor; the care of the helpless and the dependent; the establishment of Christian hospitals; the awakening of civic conscience; the study of motherhood and childhood; the enactment of laws safeguarding the health of all the people; the beginnings of a new brotherhood; the organized and successful battle against crime, vice and drink.

These are a few of the great things which have come into the world on waves of power since Paul lived. The world is immensely better than it used to be because of all these influences, every one of which has sprung from the teaching of Jesus Christ.

The beginning of a new year ought to stimulate Christendom with the thought of even newer and greater things in practical Christianity than have yet been done. Let us number a few of these, not as dreams or fancies but as actual reality; things which may be accomplished, not beyond the reach of the church to attempt, but within the reach of its possibilities.

Union of Christendom.

First, more and more people are believing every day that the time has come for a real union of Christendom. Denominational forces have done their work. There cannot be quarrel with denominationalism, but the signs of the times unmistakably prove that it has finished what it had to do, and now the Spirit of God is calling upon all the different disciples of the different churches to get together in a great band or federation; in fact, we are already living in the first chapter of its history. There are towns in the United States to-day where actual federation has been accomplished among six or eight distinct denominations. These are the first steps which will finally culminate in a united Protestantism. One of the greatest reasons for the strength and influence of Catholicism is the union of the Catholic Church; it has not been split up into a number of sects. If Catholicism is a menace to our Protestant life the best answer to it will be a united Protestantism. The only real safety for communities lies in the union of its Christian strength.

Practical Reforms.

If Christendom once becomes united it can do some great things which at present are impossible. Among these may be mentioned the abolition of the saloon; the practical survey of city life; the strength of Christianity turned in a united stream against vice; and, perhaps most important of all, the practical establishment of a Christian press.

A Christian Daily; a Missionary Magazine.

There is no reason why the churches of America should not own and publish a Christian daily paper. There is money enough and brains enough to conduct such an enterprise. This paper could be published in great centers of population like New York, Philadelphia, Boston, Cincinnati, Cleveland, Chicago, Denver, Portland, Seattle, San Francisco, and other cities, and be a tremendous help to Christian activities. The possibility of such a tremendous organ for truth and righteousness is apparent to every one. In addition to this daily paper which the new Christianity could have if it were united would also be a missionary magazine, published by all the missionary boards, going into the homes of all the people, and giving them some real knowledge of the great work of missions now being carried on by all the denominations. These new forces lie easily within the power of the united church; under the inspiration of a united Christendom they are plainly practical.

Young Life.

Among the new forces which Christianity may well consider as it opens up a new year of life is the large use of the young life in the church. If the ministers of this country would spend half their time with their Sunday schools, instead of spending so much time in preaching sermons to grown-up people, the result would be, in a short time, twice what it is at present. The hope of the world is always with the young generation; young life is responsive. Every minister ought to be his own evangelist. There is, in many parts of this country, a growing feeling on the part of the ministry

THE MIDNIGHT OF THE YEAR

BY GEORGE BIRDSEYE

THE stars in expectation glow in space,
Wherein Time's pendulum unerring swings,
And Silence breathless waits the great event.
But, hark! A peal of bells from the high tower,
As strikes the solemn Midnight of the Year.

We look behind us with a keen regret,
Before us eagerly with fresh desire,
Back to the Old and forward to the New,
From Past to Future, youth to richer years,
From memories that grieve to hopes that cheer.
One long, long peal:—and of ourselves we ask,
Why did that last stroke sound so like Farewell?

Now suddenly the air is wild with joy:—
The bells are jubilant, and gaily ring
A welcome to new life so soon to dawn.
Flashing the message each to each, the Stars
Exchange congratulations through the skies,
And benedictions send to us below;
And mind with mind and heart with heart communes,
And those that sleep feel the glad thrill in dreams.
But of the Future, ah! who can foretell
What fortune waits, what good or evil times,
To meet us ere those bells shall ring again
To celebrate the Midnight of the Year?

May our lives profit by the Years gone by,
Rich in experience, regrets and love!
Hopes we deemed dead shall wake to life again,
With new resolves, and strength for all good work
That makes the world grow better day by day.
Even in dull and selfish city streets,
Through icy storm, unmindful of the cold,
Are springing up, in beauty blossoming,
The pure white flowers of loving Charity,
And Sympathy, exchanging tear for tear.

"Joy to the World!" the happy bells ring out:
All hearts respond, this Midnight of the Year.

THE NEW COPYBOOK

IT WAS not long ago, but we wonder
To sit and count over the years,
Since we sat in the shabby old schoolhouse,
A part of its laughter and tears!
We can see our old desks and the blackboards,
And the stove and the hooks on the wall,
And the multiplication tables,
And the teacher that ruled over all!

There were lessons to learn and remember,
And sums to work out on the slate,
And a little bit more and some extra
For the sinners who stumbled in late;
There were pieces to speak on a Friday,
And essays to write now and then,
But the worst was the ink and the writing,
And the battle to conquer the pen!

And the copybooks! Oh! they were blotty!
For the pen seemed to wobble about;
The mistakes were aplenty and awful!
And alas! there was no rubbing out!
For the ink was too much of a sticker,
And the pen seemed to dig pretty deep,
And the pages were not very pretty,
And the most of us wanted to weep!

But there came a good day for the weary,
And a red-letter day of delight,
When the old copybook was all finished,
And a new one, all spotlessly white,
Was laid on the desk by the teacher,
And a chance to do better—and say!
Don't you think, you old scholars, it happens that it can well use its own powers in the shaping and directing of its own parish life, in the reaping of results for its own membership.
Just so—on each New Year's Day?

Religious Drama.

There is also a new power which the church may well consider, and that is the use of religious drama. The dramatic instinct is born in human beings, and the church has a right to give expression to these feelings in its young people. I think the church need not be afraid in using religious stories in the dramatic form; in fact, they are being used to-day in a large number of churches and results prove the wisdom of this use of new power.

Eugenics.

There is also a new force for righteousness in the study of eugenics. Teachers are being employed in the schools of different States to teach this great subject. Ministers all over the country are beginning to demand health certificates from those who have applied for marriage. There is a great wave of intelligence passing over the world to-day on this subject, and Christianity, through the church, must and will take account of this new teaching on an old subject.

The Brotherhood.

There is also a new chapter beginning for Christianity in the practice of the brotherhood of mankind. Over five thousand students from foreign countries are attending universities in this country, and many of these students are meeting like brothers and discussing great questions. No one can tell what will grow out of them, but it is safe to say that a splendid new impetus will be given to that which underlies the entire teaching of Christ. Brotherhood is at the heart of all the Master's teaching.

All these forces in the world to-day should make the opening of a new year tremendously significant for the Church of Christ. Ministers and church members to-day face the greatest of all times to live. There are forces at work which have never been apparent in the history of mankind. It is for the church, therefore, to rise to its great privilege and remember with eternal hope that Christ is the Hope of the world. Wherever Christ has gone he has created new impulses, he has changed old things over into new, and he is the Transformer because he is the great Redeemer. May this New Year bring to all the world a new vision of the possibilities of the kingdom of God among men; and a vision of the time, soon to come, when there shall be a new heaven and a new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness.

THE HEART OF LIFE

MORNING dawned and a song of hope greeted the rosy skies as Young Pilgrim set out upon his search for the Heart of Life. It was at the beginning of a new year. He knew not where his goal lay, nor how he was to find it, but the road ahead seemed broad and free, and no doubt nor fear disturbed him. The one who had sent him on his search had told him he would know of a certainty when he came to the Heart of Life.

"How shall I know it?" asked Young Pilgrim.

"It is close to the throne of Love," was the reply.

So Young Pilgrim sought the place where Love sat enthroned, and as he journeyed on he found many attractive stopping-places which enticed him to enter and there to end his search. At the gates of a stone palace near the beginning of his road a man of dignity and pleasant voice called to him.

"You cannot go until you have stayed a while with us," he said.

Within the walls, Young Pilgrim saw youths like himself. They looked eager and happy. "What place is this, and why must I stay?" he asked the man at the gate.

"This is a school and here you may learn. Life without knowledge is as nothing," the pedagogue replied.

Young Pilgrim entered and mingled with the fellows whose enthusiasm over a game attracted him. "This seems like a good place; would you advise me to stay?" he asked. "If you can get on the team," answered one of the fellows, and then rushed away into the thick of the game.

Young Pilgrim stayed. He studied hard, and played hard, and grew older and stronger. Then he remembered his search. He had not found the Heart of Life. He had acquired tastes and ambitions, and he felt that achievement was the thing most worth while. His mind was full of plans and his own heart was eager as he went on his way.

MUSIC and art opened the doors of their temples to him and he entered gladly. He longed to add his name to the list of those who had ravished the world with beauty of sound or color. And now he might achieve fame and also gain the object of his search, for surely music or art would lead him straight to the Heart of Life.

Yet his toil brought him small reward. His creations did not satisfy even himself, and the passing throng paid little heed. Disappointed, he cast aside his work and turned away from his ideals. He followed the throng and found that it led him off from his road and into the marketplace. There he saw Fortune on a high throne. So intense and eager were the faces about him, so large were the rewards some of the throng snatched from Fortune, that before he knew it he had joined the mad scramble. Again and again he was thrown down and almost trampled upon, but he fought on—and won.

"Now I am strong, and I can do as I please," he thought. "If I want to find the Heart of Life, I can search for it in my leisure, or I can hire others to find it for me." So the matter passed out of his mind until discontent stole upon him, and in the night watches a voice spoke, saying, "Only when you have found the Heart of Life will you find contentment."

Then, one day, Pleasure beckoned, and said, gaily, "I will take away all your weariness and discontent and give you happiness; follow me." So he followed her eagerly. But after a few days of forgetfulness, he saw Discontent lurking in the shadow, and, as though the look were a permission, the ugly shape sprang upon him and would not be shaken off. A cry came from him in the darkness, "Oh, where is that Heart of Life? Where is the place near the throne of Love?"

CHURCH bells called him to the house of prayer and praise. He went there and found men and women who seemed to be at peace. "Is there room for me here?" he asked. The church was in debt, and he was known as a wealthy man. He was welcomed, and the money he gave helped the church, though to him it was so little that if it had been stolen from him he never would have known it. He joined in the social activities of the parish and was made president of the men's club and a trustee of the church. "Now, in this holy place, surely I shall find the Heart of Life," he told himself; but although he worked with zest, and helped the finance committee, and strove as president of the men's club to keep up and improve the social "tone" of the church, he failed to find the satisfaction he expected. Now and then he remembered the promise at the beginning that he would know to a certainty when he found the Heart of Life. Evidently, because he felt no such certainty, his search was yet unfinished.

Then another door opened to him, and as he entered he found a place of comfort and gladness beyond any that he had known. The place was Home—a home of his own making. With pride and joy he greeted his young wife and watched her as she transformed the furnished house into the home. With pride and satisfaction he led her out into society and noted the admiration of his friends. With exulting spirit he brought her back to their home and called her "Mine!" And the pride grew with the years as he saw his children grow strong and handsome and learned of their achievements among their fellows.

"Now at last my search is ended. Here in my home is the very Heart of Life. Here on her throne of love my wife is queen and I and my children form her court."

And a voice spoke to him in the silence. "There is one here who has indeed found the Heart of Life, but it is not thou. Search yet again. Thou shalt not find the precious treasure in the abundance of what thou hast, nor yet in anything thou canst buy. It is not cheap, and the price of it is not as the price of gifts or comfort or feasting. It cannot be gained by looking upon the things of self but rather upon the things of others. It is found near the throne of love, yet all the love in the world would be worth little without it. No Christmas would ever have been known if the love of him who was born on that day had lacked it. No wife, no husband, no daughter, no son, no friend can find the real Heart of Life anywhere until something cherished is yielded, until some pain is gladly suffered, until the needs and joys of others are more to be desired than the precious possessions of self. One thing lackest thou. Go and sell all that thou hast of self-love and come and find the Heart of Life on the altar of SACRIFICE."

TOWN AND COUNTRY

OH, the ways in town are merry,
Where the marts of fashion are,
While along the level asphalt
Whirls my lady in her car;
But the country roads are fairer—
Silver ribbons, winding down,
Edged with pink and white of clover,
From the woodland's grassy crown.

Oh, the lights in town are flashing;
Jewels they of burning glare,
Searing tired eyes to blindness,
Blanching all the upper air.
But the country lights are hearthsome—
Leaping fire and candle-spark,
Or serenity of star-shine,
Smiling through the friendly dark.

There's a splendid flush of color
On the crowded ways of town,
Blush of chiffon, sheen of satin,
Fruity bloom of velvet gown;
But the daisy's alabaster,
And the flash of bluebird's wing,
And the rose's tender tinting,
More content and joyance bring.

All the city's ways of fashion
Throng with idlers, pleasure-bent,
Avid, eager, wasting daylight,
Fluttering till the night is spent;
But my little rustic ribbon,
Softly colored, summer-drest,
Leads me home before the sunset,
Leaves me with my heart at rest.

NORA ARCHIBALD SMITH.

A New Call to Prayer

IT IS especially fitting at the beginning of the Week of Prayer that the attention of CHRISTIAN HERALD readers should be called to the earnest efforts of the Rev. W. A. Therrill to revive the "concert of prayer" established at Nottingham, England, in 1784. Mr. Therrill's plan has already been endorsed by a number of ecclesiastical and ministerial bodies, among them the North Philadelphia Baptist Association, the South Carolina Baptist Convention, the ministers' meetings of the Methodist, the Presbyterian and the Reformed denominations at New York, the Presbyterian and Methodist ministers' meetings of Philadelphia.

Following is the resolution prepared by Mr. Therrill and adopted by the bodies mentioned and indorsed by other influential religious leaders:

"Resolved, first, that we most respectfully recommend to all the churches of this body faithful observance of the second regular midweek prayer-meeting hour every month, or as near to it as convenient, in special, united, fervent prayer to Almighty God for the unreserved consecration of every saved member, for personal, hand-to-hand and heart-to-heart exertions to win to the Saviour of lost sinners the lost ones about him or her, as God may provide suitable opportunity; for the Holy Spirit, in very great measure, on all the churches, ministers and people; for full development of all their unused forces and resources, and for the speedy and thorough evangelization of America and all the world.

"Resolved, second, that we most respectfully recommend this plan for a monthly prayer and consecration service, at the regular time and place, to all of our denomination, both in cities and elsewhere, and both to old and young, rich and poor, white and colored.

"Resolved, third, that we most cordially invite all of all other denominations who love our Lord Jesus Christ supremely to unite in fervent prayer and supplication with us for a most gracious revival of genuine religion, and to them, also, we most respectfully recommend this plan."

All who are interested in spreading the circulation and adoption of this simple plan for putting the infinite power of prayer behind the church's hope for a world-wide revival may address Mr. Therrill at the Broadway Central Hotel, New York City.

EXCEEDS HIGHEST EXPECTATIONS

An old woman of nearly 88 years sends you her thanks for the Bible and the Almanac just received. I am highly pleased with both. They exceed in every way my highest expectations. As for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD itself, I cannot do without it. MRS. E. H. STODDARD.

IN THE FOOTSTEPS OF ST. PAUL

FROM LYSTRA THE FICKLE TO DERBE THE PEACEFUL

BY REV. FRANCIS E. CLARK, D.D., LL.D.

Founder and President of the Christian Endeavor Society

IT WAS in the famous temple of Lystra, called the temple of "Zeus-before-the-City," that Paul and Barnabas were hailed as gods. They had the greatest difficulty in restraining the people from worshiping them as Zeus and Hermes (or Jupiter and Mercury, as they would be called in the Latin language). Both Latin and Greek were used in Lystra at this time, though probably only the Roman officials spoke the former language, while even the "barbarians" understood the Greek language in which Paul spoke to them, so that doubtless the exact words in which Paul and Barnabas were proclaimed as gods were "Zeus and Hermes."

Reluctantly the people dispersed when they heard the emphatic and almost indignant remonstrance of the apostles. They led away the oxen which they were about to sacrifice in their honor before the temple. They put by the garlands which the apostles did not allow the Lystrians to place on their brows, and the city resumed its normally quiet aspect.

But soon all this was changed. The Jews, who were always following hard after Paul, to root up the good seed he had sowed, came from Antioch and Iconium, and persuaded the people that it was through some alliance with the powers of darkness that the miracle on the lame man had been wrought. It seems almost incredible that the people who would worship Paul one day should stone him the next; but such revulsions of feeling among an excitable and fickle mob have often been paralleled in human history.

Luke wastes no words in telling the thrilling story. In a single verse he sums up the facts that nearly resulted in the martyrdom of the great apostle, and almost cut short his life at the very beginning of his mission to the Gentiles. Here is Luke's tellingly succinct account: "And there came thither certain Jews from Antioch and Iconium, and persuaded the people, and having stoned Paul drew him out of the city, supposing he had been dead." However, his work was not yet finished, and the disciples stood round about him, though bruised and battered by the cruel stones, he rose up and came into the city.

All that we saw in the early days of 1912 on the site of ancient Lystra was a hillside covered with fragments of broken marble and a few larger stones, scarcely one of them in the position where it was originally placed. Lystra, like most of these ancient cities, has served as a quarry for the neighboring villages, and for a thousand years past when any of the inhabitants wished to build a house or a mosque, a retaining wall or a buffalo shed, they have hastened to the almost inexhaustible treasures of marble and granite, which were erected with so much pains and expense into the beautiful cities of old. Magnificent marble columns, ornate capitals, memorial stones covered with inscriptions, the tombs of the dead even, have served the vandals of later generations and provided for them abundant building materials.

So it has come about in Lystra, as in other cities of antiquity, that scarcely a trace of its ancient glories remains. Indeed, it takes a skilled and learned archeologist to determine even the site of many of these ancient cities. Lystra was passed by Sir William Ramsay, who journeyed within a few yards of the ruins of the city without ever realizing that he was practically on the site of the town for which he was searching, and it was only the discovery of a Lystrian coin and a single monumental inscription by Professor Sterrett of Cornell University a few years later, that settled forever the position of the ancient city for which explorers and archeologists had so long been searching.

On the great sloping hillside, where the chief buildings of Lystra stood, and the level plain at its foot, the only semblance of buildings we saw were some rough stone sheepfolds where the shepherds shelter their timid flocks by night or in stormy weather. Built into one of these rude sheepfolds we found a beautifully sculptured stone with inscriptions that would rejoice the heart of an archeologist. In another part of the plain we saw the scanty ruins of a small Christian church. Near it a fountain gushes forth. This fountain is called Ayasma, and its very name shows that it was considered sacred by the Christians.

A MODERN REAPER IN MACEDONIA

The most interesting site in all Lystra is that of the temple where Paul and Barnabas were hailed as gods. At least there is every probability that its location has been discovered, for on the level plain, just before the land begins to rise to the hill on which the chief buildings were situated, on its southeast side stands a pedestal on which is an inscription showing that it was dedicated to the Emperor Augustus, whose worship was connected with the chief temple. Here undoubtedly was the temple of "Zeus-before-the-City," and wonderful discoveries and confirmation of Scripture doubtless await the excavator's spade.

Before we finally bid adieu to Lystra, I must remind my readers of a young man who has forever made the city famous, for this was the birthplace of Timothy, the son of the godly Eunice and grandson of the pious Lois. It is extremely likely that this young man was one of the disciples who "encircled" Paul when, bruised and fainting, he was dragged out of the city as one dead. We do not know whether or not he made himself known to Paul on this visit, but on Paul's second missionary journey he found the young Timothy already a Christian, "well reported of" by his fellow Christians and by all the people in the neighborhood. On this second journey he joined himself to St. Paul, and ever after was his "beloved son" and often his faithful companion in the perils and hardships which still awaited him.

THE GOOD FORTUNE OF DERBE. COIN OF EMPRESS FAUSTINA THE YOUNGER

We do not know that there were any other Jews in Lystra besides the mother and the grandmother of Timothy. The former had married a Greek, who was evidently a man of importance in the city, and Timothy, in addition to the advantage of a noble and affectionate disposition, had the double advantage of a godly training by those women of "unfeigned faith" whom Paul in his second leter to Timothy made immortal for all time.

The day after the stoning, the apostle started for Derbe, and it is interesting to note that in the catalogue of his many sufferings and persecutions he was stoned but once, and that at Lystra. "Once was I stoned," he says, and how vivid must have been his memory of that day in Lystra as he wrote! Derbe is some eleven hours' journey by modern conveyance to the southwest of Lystra. If the Christians went on foot, it probably took two days, and perhaps longer, by reason of the weakened condition of St. Paul. The rough road skirts the mountain region of the Isaurian country, and throughout its whole length, Kara Dagh, the great black mountain, the mountain of the "thousand and one churches," is in plain sight, for "it rises like an island in the Lycaonian plain." There was one outstanding feature of the landscape which must have impressed Paul as it does every modern traveler. This is the great mountain, Hadji Baba, which rises 8,000 feet above the ruins of the ancient city. The name means "Pilgrim Father," and some have supposed that it has reference to Paul, the great missionary "pilgrim father," who journeyed around its base to the Roman garrison city of Derbe.

We know less about Derbe than any other of the Pauline cities, and the ruins above ground are very meager and unsatisfactory. We know that this was the native town of Gaius, who was Paul's companion in travel, and who, with Aristarchus, was seized by the angry people of Ephesus, when they thought the shrine of Diana was in danger. Gaius was one of the few men in all the Bible who was honored with an epistle, which is now a part of our sacred canon, written specially to him, for the first verse of the Third Epistle of John reads: "The elder unto Gaius the beloved, whom I love in truth."

In Derbe and among its inhabitants, we may well believe that Paul found a peaceful haven of rest. We read of no persecutions, of no envious Jews, of no stonings or beatings. Here he stayed until he was healed of the cruel wounds he had received at Lystra. Here, Luke tells us, he "preached the Gospel" and "taught many," but only a fraction of a verse records his uneventful life in this the last Roman outpost of the Lycaonian country.

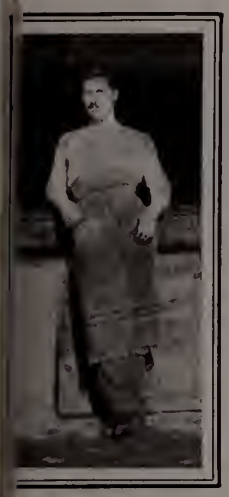
Then the apostles retraced their steps and went back over the same route to Lystra and to Iconium and to Antioch, "confirming the souls of the disciples and exhorting them to continue in the faith, and that we must, through much tribulation, enter into the kingdom of God." What a chance was here for the display of heroics! But not a word is said of the undaunted courage of the apostle in returning to the very cities where he had been stoned and maltreated and from which he had just been banished.

More than once on future jorneys did he return to these same Galatian cities. Lystra, Iconium and Antioch were probably visited four times by Paul. The epistle that bears the name of the Galatians tells us the most that we know of the future story of these cities. They were soon visited by Judaizers, who tried to persuade the Christians that a Jewish type of Christianity was the most worthy one. Many were evidently persuaded by these false teachers, so that we do not wonder that Paul wrote in fiery indignation, "O foolish Galatians, who hath bewitched you that ye should not obey the truth?" . . . "Though we or an angel from heaven preach any other Gospel unto you than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed." The whole epistle is a plea for freedom in opposition to the bondage into which the Judaizers would again bring the Galatian Christians. We cannot better close than with the noble motto which St. Paul gave to them and to all succeeding Christians: "Stand fast, therefore, in the liberty with which Christ has made us free."

A PASTORAL SCENE IN THE ORIENT

DARK DAYS IN THE BALKANS

INCREASING NEED AMONG THE WOMEN AND CHILDREN IS FOUND EVERYWHERE BY THE RELIEF WORKERS. PASTOR FURNAJIEFF OF THE CHRISTIAN HERALD RELIEF COMMITTEE TELLS OF THE WORK AND ITS NEEDS. ENGLISH "FRIENDS" LEND A HAND. $1,000 MORE FORWARDED FOR THE SUFFERERS



UNIVERSITY STUDENT SERVING AS A BAKER

IT IS gone from the front pages of the great daily newspapers. The mighty guns are silent for a time, and the exhausted armies in Thrace and Macedonia rest upon the trodden battlefields. The world's interest has gone from the theater of war to London. There the representatives of the Balkan allies, of Turkey, of Austria and the other deeply interested Powers have gathered and taken up the prodigious task of solving the complicated problems and unraveling the tangled situations to which the Balkan war has given birth.

The pawns are still upon the chessboard of war, but the great moves and deeds of daring and endurance ave stopped. There is nothing spectacular about now—just the poverty and suffering, the cold, e hunger and the pain—and with its usual oughtlessness the public has gone back to its in- rest in the daily round of reported investigations id disasters, births and deaths, fires and floods, mances and crimes. Yet all the letters from the ithful workers in the Balkans bring heartend- g stories of the suffering in those lands upon hich that grim specter war has laid its searing and.

The members of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Relief ommittee are deeply grateful to all who have ded in making possible the remittances which ave already reached them and which they are now sing in their work. Pastor Furnajieff, in one of his ecent letters, tells of the progress of the work, iving both the needs and the encouraging fea- ures. He writes:

"Last Sunday I was introduced to two English entlemen who had just arrived, carrying with hem a large check for relief work. It proved hat I could be of assistance to them in studying he situation. Individual cases, families, whole uarters of the city, other cities and villages in the ountry I could point out to them, where they ould find need for all they could bring. These entlemen are Friends. Their first business was o interview our queen, who is untiring in her ef- orts on behalf of the wounded soldiers, and the iserable condition of scores of thousands of non- ombatants, who are in distress and almost at the oint of starvation. The queen is a noble woman, nd her sympathetic heart goes out to all sufferers; herefore her suggestion to these good English peo- le was to procure flour and beans and take up re- ef work in the city of Adrianople as soon as it urrenders. In Adrianople there are thousands of urks that will come out of the present siege in tter destitution. It is believed that there must be bout ten thousand Christians who have died of tarvation in that city thus far; besides, there are everal thousands of Jews there who must be fed or the winter, as well as the Christians (Greeks, rmenians, Bulgarians, etc.). According to pres- nt calculations the four thousand pounds sterling hich these good Friends have brought will be suf- icient to feed the hungry in Adrianople just four ays! Then what?

"We went to the prime minister, Mr. Geshoff, to he minister of the interior, Mr. Ludskanoff, and he minister of the railways, Mr. Franga, to seek heir advice. The first two speak splendid Eng- ish, while the third is perfectly at home with rench. The first word of the three ministers was n expression of gratitude to the donors of this sum or their greatness of heart in coming to our aid. One of the ministers said to them: 'In the city of drianople alone there may be forty thousand to ifty thousand people of the various creeds and na- ionalities who must be fed after the capitulation f the city. This enormous work will fall on the houlders of the Bulgarians, as we are duty bound o provide as far as possible for all who are in need f food throughout the country that we have liber- ted from the Turkish rule. So, gentlemen, we are rateful to you that you have come to help, and we will give you every facility and co-operation pos- ible.'

"There are hundreds of cases like the following, which I cite merely as an illustration: An old cou- ple here in the city have sent their five sons to the war, leaving in the house daughters-in-law and quite a number of grandchildren, but no provision for the winter. The limited funds appropriated by the City Council assist the small children of soldiers, but nothing for the whiteheaded old couple, who depended absolutely on the wages of their sons for their 'bread and salt.' (That is the phrase we use in place of your phrase, 'bread and butter.') The other day that couple said: 'It is twenty-four hours since we have had anything to eat.' In the name of such helpless humanity that has already tasted the bitter fruits of the war, I appeal to all of you favored brethren and sisters to do for them as you would like to be done by in an exchange of circumstances.

"In one of the hospitals the other day, some of the wounded soldiers requested me to write postals to their homes and families, stating where and how their loved ones are. But there was one thing I could not do. These wounded and temporarily disabled soldiers have families with small children at home, and I could not answer the request to send a few francs for flour to these poor non-combatants. In such cases I ask myself: is it fair that I take to these brave but wounded soldiers only the spiritual comfort of the Gospel, while their families are in need of their daily bread? I am, therefore, glad that the CHRISTIAN HERALD readers and friends are helping the Relief Committee to bring joy and life to innocent children and helpless mothers.

"One question has weighed heavily on my mind, and I would like to make mention of it right here. There are hundreds and thousands who are exactly in the position to those of whom the Master spoke just before his crucifixion. (See Matt. 24: 19.) None outside of themselves can realize the helplessness and dejection of spirit that is theirs. If this cannot move our hearts to generous help, what else can?

"Pastor Tsakoff of Philippopolis writes me that suffering and hunger are daily increasing at a frightful rate. Many whose breadearners have gone to the war are getting desperate, and while hitherto they have been reluctant to ask assistance, now they do not conceal their need. Actual hunger has driven them to it.

"Friends, pray for our wounded soldiers, for the troops and for the needy ones; and send us help. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is the medium of communication between God's people in distress and those in plenty."

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has been enabled this week to forward another remittance of $1,000 to the Relief Committee. This now makes a total of $5,250 for the relief work. The following additional contributions have been received for the fund:

WOMEN AND CHILDREN AWAITING THE DISTRIBUTION OF BREAD

POLLYANNA

BY ELEANOR H. PORTER

Author of "The Story of Marco," "Into Still Waters," "The Transformation of Margaret," etc.

A SERIAL STORY. ILLUSTRATED BY M. STOCKTON MULFORD

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

Pollyanna, eleven years old, comes East to live with her aunt, Miss Polly Harrington, of Beldingsville, Vt. Miss Harrington is a lady of most unlovely and ungenerous character, though she believes herself to be a very good woman, and tries vigorously to do in every case what she believes to be her duty. She has consented to receive Pollyanna at the request of the Ladies' Aid Society of the small Western town where the child's father had been pastor of a poor mission church. Her mother had died some years earlier, her father but recently. The young wife had never received her family's forgiveness for marrying the poor minister. But now Miss Harrington consents to receive the little girl and directs her servant Nancy to prepare a small attic room for her. She wishes to put her at a distance from her own apartments and avoid the risk of her marring the valuable furnishings of any other room. Nancy is sent to the station to meet Pollyanna. From every fresh disappointment she rallies amazingly, always finding something to be glad about. She explains that this is a game which her father had taught her and played with her. Nancy agrees to try to play the game, too. Pollyanna takes jelly to Mrs. Snow, a fault-finding invalid, and wheedles her into having her hair dressed and her curtains raised. After a number of visits Mrs. Snow herself begins to play the game. Pollyanna also meets a mysterious silent Man, who is, she learns later, Mr. John Pendleton, a rich and rather sour recluse, and after a number of one-sided salutations makes him talk to her. Aunt Polly at last has Pollyanna moved to a larger and more beautiful room. After she has surprised her aunt into adopting a stray dog and cat, she finds a homeless boy, and brings him in, confident that Miss Polly will keep him. She is disappointed in this, however, her aunt resolutely resisting the strange influence the little girl has already begun to have upon her. Nothing daunted, Pollyanna takes the boy's case to the Ladies' Aid Society of the Beldingsville Church, but here, too, meets with disappointment. Returning through the woods she finds Mr. John Pendleton, who has fallen and broken his leg. He sends Pollyanna to his house, a big, silent and terrifying edifice, to telephone for Dr. Chilton to come with men and a stretcher. Pollyanna performs her errand with amazing alacrity, returning to hold his head on her lap till the doctor comes.

IT WAS about a week after the accident in Pendleton Woods that Pollyanna said to her aunt, who had returned the night before from a brief visit with relatives in Boston:

"Aunt Polly, please would you mind very much if I took Mrs. Snow's calf's-foot jelly this week to some one else? I'm sure Mrs. Snow wouldn't—this once."

"Dear me, Pollyanna, what are you up to now?" sighed her aunt. "You are the most extraordinary child!"

"Nothing, Aunt Polly, truly, that you would mind, I'm sure. You let me take jelly to her, so I thought you would to him—this once. You see, broken legs aren't like—like lifelong invalids, so his won't last forever as Mrs. Snow's does, and she can have all the rest of the things after just once or twice."

"'Him'? 'He'? 'Broken leg'? What are you talking about, Pollyanna?"

Pollyanna stared; then her face relaxed.

"Oh, I forgot. You see, it happened while you were gone. It was the very day you went that I found him in the woods, you know; and I had to unlock his house and telephone for the men and the doctor, and hold his head, and everything. Then I came away and haven't seen him since. But when Nancy made the jelly for Mrs. Snow this week I thought how nice it would be if I could take it to him instead of her, just this once. Aunt Polly, may I?"

"Yes, yes, I suppose so," acquiesced Miss Polly, a little wearily. "Who did you say he was?"

"The Man. I mean Mr. John Pendleton."

Miss Polly almost sprang from her chair. "John Pendleton!"

"Yes. Nancy told me his name. Maybe you know him." Miss Polly did not answer this. Instead, she asked: "Do you know him?"

"Oh, yes. He always speaks and smiles—now. He's only cross outside, you know. I'll go and get the jelly. Nancy had it 'most fixed when I came in," finished Pollyanna, already halfway across the room.

"Pollyanna, wait!" Miss Polly's voice was suddenly very stern. "I've changed my mind. I would prefer that Mrs. Snow had that jelly to-day—as usual. That is all. You may go now."

Pollyanna's face fell.

"Oh, but Aunt Polly, hers will last. She can always be sick and have things, you know; but his is just a broken leg, and legs don't last—I mean broken ones. He's had it a whole week now."

"Yes, I remember. I heard Mr. Pendleton had met with an accident," said Miss Polly, a little stiffly; "but—I do not care to be sending jelly to John Pendleton, Pollyanna."

"I suppose you don't like him," admitted Pollyanna. "But I wouldn't say 'twas you sent it. I'd say 'twas me. I like him. I'd be glad to send him jelly."

Miss Polly began to shake her head again. Then, suddenly, she stopped, and asked in a curiously quiet voice:

"Does he know who you—are, Pollyanna?"

The little girl sighed.

"I reckon not. I told him my name once, but he never calls me it—never."

"Does he know where you—live?"

"Oh, no. I never told him that."

"Then he doesn't know you're my—niece?"

"I don't think so."

"Oh my! what pretty hair you've got!" prattled Pollyanna

There was silence. Miss Polly was looking at Pollyanna with eyes that did not seem to see her at all. The little girl, shifting impatiently from one small foot to the other, sighed audibly. Then Miss Polly roused herself with a start.

"Very well, Pollyanna," she said at last, still in that queer voice, so unlike her own; "you may—you may take the jelly to Mr. Pendleton as your own gift. But understand—I do not send it. Be very sure that he does not think I do."

"Yes'm—no'm—thank you, Aunt Polly," exulted Pollyanna, as she flew through the door.

CHAPTER XII

DR. CHILTON

THE great gray pile of masonry looked very different to Pollyanna when she made her second visit to the house of Mr. John Pendleton. Wi dows were open, an elderly woman was hangi out clothes in the back yard, and the doctor's g stood under the porte-cochère.

The woman who had been hanging out t clothes opened the door.

"If you please, I've brought some calf's-foot jel for Mr. Pendleton," smiled Pollyanna.

"Thank you," said the woman, reaching for t bowl in the little girl's hand. "Who shall I s sent it?"

The doctor, coming into the hall at that m ment, heard the woman's words and saw the di appointed look on Pollyanna's face. He steppe quickly forward.

"Ah! some calf's-foot jelly?" he ask genially. "That will be fine! Maybe you like to see our patient; eh?"

"Oh, yes, sir," beamed Pollyanna; and t woman, in obedience to a nod from the docto led the way down the hall at once, thoug plainly with vast surprise on her face.

Behind the doctor, a young man (a traine nurse from the nearest city) gave a protes ing exclamation.

"But, doctor, didn't Mr. Pendleton gi orders not to admit—any one?"

"Oh, yes," nodded the doctor, imperturl ably. "But I'm giving orders now. I'll tak the risk." Then he added whimsically: "Yo don't know it, of course; but that little gi is better than a six-quart bottle of tonic an day. That's why I sent her in."

"Who is she?"

For one brief moment the doctor hesitate "She's the niece of one of our best-know residents. Her name is Pollyanna Whittie I—I don't happen to enjoy a very extensiv personal acquaintance with the little lady a yet; but lots of my patients do—I'm thankfu to say!"

The nurse smiled.

"Indeed! And what are the special ingre dients of this wonder-working tonic of hers?

The doctor shook his head.

"I don't know. As near as I can find ou it is an overwhelming, unquenchable glad ness for everything that has happened, or i going to happen. I wish I could prescrib her—and buy her, as I would a box of pill —though if there gets to be many of her i the world, you and I might as well go to rib bon-selling and ditch-digging, for all th money we'd get out of nursing and doctor ing," he laughed, picking up the reins an stepping into the gig.

Pollyanna, meanwhile, in accordance wit the doctor's orders, was being escorted t John Pendleton's room.

Her way led through the great library a the end of the hall, and very soon she foun herself in a sumptuously furnished bedroom while the maid was saying in a frightene voice:

"If you please, sir, here—here's a little gir with some jelly. The doctor said I was t —to bring her in."

The next moment Pollyanna found hersel alone with a very cross-looking man flat o his back in bed.

"See here, didn't I say—" began an angr voice; "oh, it's you!" it broke off not ver graciously, as the visitor advanced towar the bed.

"Yes, sir," smiled Pollyanna. "Oh, I'm s glad they let me in! You see, at first th lady 'most took my jelly, and I was so afrai I wasn't going to see you at all. Then th doctor came, and he said I might. Wasn't h lovely to let me see you?"

In spite of himself the man's lips twitched int a smile; but all he said was "Humph!"

"And I've brought you some jelly," resume Pollyanna; "calf's-foot. I hope you like it." There was a rising intonation to her voice.

"Never ate it." The fleeting smile had gone an the scowl had come back to the man's face.

For a brief instant Pollyanna's countenance showed disappointment; but it cleared as she se her bowl of jelly down.

"Didn't you? Well, if you didn't, then you can' know you don't like it, anyhow; can you? So I reckon I'm glad you haven't, after all. Now if you knew—"

MAN, THE CROWN OF CREATION*

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

WHEN God made man he set a crown upon his creation. This he did by creating man in his own image, and by giving him rule over all things. How is man like d? "He has the same sense of justice, the same nerosity, the same compassion, the same mental d moral characteristics, but in smaller measure." —Lyman Abbott. "Thou hast made him but little wer than God and crownest him with glory and nor" (Ps. 8: 5, V.). In the King mes Version, this rse reads, "Thou st made him a lit- lower than the gels." And now an takes his right- l place, next to d, not below even e angels.

In the year 1780, Easter Day, a an by the name of avriel Romanvitch erzhavin, a Rus- an, wrote a mar- lous "Ode to God." has been said, Outside of the Bi- e there is nothing compare with it sublimity and im- ressiveness." We ve parts:

"Like a drop owned in the sea -Is all that shining rmament before hee—But what is e Universe that I e? And what am I efore Thee? In yon erial ocean exist— illions of worlds— undreds of mil- ons of other worlds nd yet—When I enture to compare iem with Thee— hey are but a sin- le dot—And I in hy presence am aught.

"Naught! But in ie Thou shinest— n the majesty of hy goodness — In ie Thou reflectest hyself — As the un in a tiny drop f water—Naught! ut life I feel,—Un- atisfied with aught, soar—Ever aloft nto the heights;— ly soul yearns to be Thine,—Penetrates, medi- ates, thinks: I am, therefore Thou art also."

There are in all eleven parts to this wonderful de. It has been published in German, English, Bohemian, Italian, Spanish and Latin. It has been ranslated into Japanese, and by order of the late mperor it was embroidered in gold and hung in he temple of Jeddo. Translated into Chinese, it as written on silk and suspended in the imperial alace in Peking.

There is another Ode to God, written by Israel's most famous king—David; wonderfully does it set forth the coronation of man—it is Psalm 8—let us read it, and learn it ' heart; yes, by heart.

O Jehovah, our Lord!
How excellent is thy name in all the earth!

God made for the soul of man to live in the most wonderful workshop the world has ever seen. Although made in remote ages, it contains so many up-to-date "modern appliances" that it is difficult to count them all. We will name some of them: the dome of the head; the telescope in the eyes, self-adjusting; the whispering gallery in the ear, the pulleys and hammers and gauges and scales in the hand and other parts of the body, the system of drains and canals in the veins and arteries, the telegraph and telephone systems in the nerves, the furnace in the stomach, and the laboratory as well. Never was so much crowded together in so small a plant as the human body, and never did machinery after being once set in motion move so automatically and almost without the care of an overseer, and no workmen at all.

Architecture was centuries learning to build a dome as the skull is built. Music has been ages inventing the harp, the flute, and other instruments that are in the human throat. Chemistry can not yet use all the laws of chemical action that are daily employed in our bodies. Mechanics cannot arrange pulleys and levers more successfully than are fixed about the human eye and foot. And yet the soul is greatest, for the soul is immortal, while the body is only mortal, and at best will not last long—three score years and ten, perhaps, and then it will return to dust. But our souls! God breathed them into us, and let us breathe after him and commit ourselves to him while we have breath.

THE LAST THREE OF THE BURNE-JONES PANELS

The first three pictures of this series, entitled "Creation," which were painted by Sir E. Burne-Jones, Bart., in 1877, were presented in last week's issue. The final panels, here reproduced, symbolize "The Creation of the Heavenly Bodies," "The Creation of Living Things," and "The Creation of Man."

A Beautiful Poem

For the children to learn

Where did you come from, baby dear?
Out of the Everywhere into the Here.
Where did you get your eyes so blue?
Out of the sky as I came through.
Where did you get that little tear?
I found it waiting when I got here.
What makes your cheeks like the warm white rose?
Something better than any one knows.
Where did you get your little ear?
God spoke, and it came out to hear.
Where did you get your little hands?
Love made itself into hooks and bands.
Feet, whence did you come, you darling things?
From the same box as the cherub's wings.
But how did they all just come to be you?
God thought about me, and so I grew.
But why did you come to us, you dear?
God thought about you, and so I am here.

GEORGE MACDONALD.

Where did Adam get his name? From the Hebrew word adamah, meaning "earth-born."

Where did Eve get her name? It was given to her by Adam (Gen. 3: 20), and it means "motherhood."

What was Eden? It was the beautiful home which God had prepared for Adam and Eve. It was not a stately mansion, not a mansion at all, but a paradise of trees and flowers and running waters.

Where was Eden? That is what people in all ages of the world have been trying to discover. The best scholarship has settled on the tableland in lower Mesopotamia, which lies between four rivers, Euphrates and Tigris (called "Hiddekel" in Gen. 2: 14), Pison and Gihon, arms of the Red Sea, for ancient usage called the side of a sea by the name "river." The whole of Mesopotamia may have been Eden (see map of Armenia and Assyria in the Red

* THE INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON for January 12, 913. The Creation of Man. Gen. 1: 26, 27, 2: 4-25. Ps. 8. OLDEN TEXT: "God created man in his own image." Gen. 1: 27.

OUR SUNDAY SCHOOL SUPERINTENDENTS' ROUND TABLE

—SUNDAY SCHOOL SUPERINTENDENTS ought to eize the opportunity while the Men and Reli- ion Movement is making men feel they must ake a larger share of church work to show nem that one of the most manly things to do to take a class of adolescent boys, and become "big brother" in a bigger, broader sense even han those who take that responsibility in connec- ion with the juvenile courts of our larger cities. man who has been aroused to "do something," aving decided that one of the best things a hristian man can do is to guide the develop- nent of a class of boys, may need a year of Bible study before he can effectively teach a lass of boys full of questionings and do them ood and not harm. He is on the right road if he is in a Bible or training class, and about all who are not already teaching boys should be in such a training class, and they should have some pocket editions of helpful books to utilize every spare hour in preparation for such a work. It is appropriate to repeat here that the largest growth in Sunday school attendance for two years past has been in men's classes, whose leaders ought to make it their chief aim to graduate good teachers for boys. All students of boys are agreed that they should have men teachers, if capable men can be found. The church officers would go a long way to supply teachers for such classes if public sentiment in the churches were aroused to the point that it was regarded as a dishonor for a deacon or elder or trustee to do nothing in the church beyond ushering and taking collections and like functions, while a class of boys with destinies in the balance are needing his strong leadership. The spiritual offices of a church should first and most of all share the preacher's teaching work, counting their occasional business meetings as but secondary to real work for individual character and a better social life. Pastors and superintendents should not wait for deacons to volunteer their services. That might seem egotistic, for teaching is only second to preaching, and teachers should therefore be called, and called in the most impressible way by a joint call of pastor, superintendent and class. Why not also by vote of the "official board" or "session" to give the great work its due emphasis? We should like to hear from any school where more than half the classes of boys are taught by men; also from schools that put dignity and honor and emphasis on the teachers' work by making invitations to teach something more than the verbal request of the superintendent. As preachers are impressively ordained, and elders also, why not Sunday school teachers? It would help to hold them to about the hardest task any class of people do without pay, the teaching of other people's children, if quarterly, or at least annually, the parents thus aided in their greatest work should compare notes with teachers on co-operation of home and school.

DAILY MEDITATIONS

A SCRIPTURAL THOUGHT FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR

BY REV. J. H. JOWETT, D.D.

WEDNESDAY, January 1. Psalm 33: 1-9—"Let all the inhabitants of the world stand in awe of him." The awe that expresses itself in dread would paralyze us: the awe that expresses itself in reverence would fill us with life. Mere dread would stiffen us into stone: reverence makes us sensitive as an aspen leaf. The reverent spirit thrills to the divine presence as the silver birch on the mountain slope thrills to the touch of the morning breeze. Reverence is sensitiveness, perceptiveness; it bows before the August, it responds to all the delicate movements of love.

And so it is true that reverence is the basis of all noble character. "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom." It is the raw material of all wise and noble achievement. Given reverence, perfection is a radiant possibility. We can "perfect holiness in the fear of the Lord." The man who is devoid of reverence may be very busy, but no temple does he build: at the end of the day he will have a rubbish-heap. "The nations that will not fear thee shall utterly perish."

THURSDAY, January 2. Job 38: 1-15—"I will demand of thee, and answer thou me." When our God begins to ask questions our pride is soon humbled, for the limits of our knowledge and power are speedily reached. The mist is very close to our doors, and in a very few steps we are lost on a trackless moor. Who can trace the real springs of a tear and lay his hand on the emotion that gave it birth? Who can lead us into the bright realm where smiles are born? Who knoweth the way of a frown, or who can uncover the secrets of fear? No living man can explain his own breathing, or can unravel the mysterious decree which moves his own finger!

And as there is so much mystery it must be surely true that mystery is a very gracious thing. Uncertainty is a divine ministry of blessedness. If it were not so he would have told us! "I have many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now." If it were best for us that the mist should be removed he would roll it up like a garment and give us the light of unclouded day. But the mist remains, the home of blessing. "He cometh in a thick cloud." "The clouds drop fatness."

FRIDAY, January 3. Jeremiah 10: 10-17—"He hath made the earth by his power." And he is making it still. Even in the material world "his mercies are new every morning." James Smeatham used to speak of going into his garden "to see what the Lord is doing." He would stand on the top of Highgate Hill on a blustering night "to watch the goings of the Lord in the storm." And all this means that to James Smeatham creation was not merely a single event but a process whose countless events are still going on. He watched his Lord at work! Every sunset was a new creation from the Almighty Maker's hands.

To many of us the Creator is remote from his works. He is not immediately near. And so he no longer "walks in the garden in the cool of the day." The garden is no longer a holy place. Let us recover the sacredness of things. Let us "practice the presence of God." Let us link his love and power to every flower that blows. And so shall we be able to say, as we move amid the glories of the natural world, "The Lord is in his holy temple."

SATURDAY, January 4. Isaiah 40: 9-28—Let me mark the range of this teaching. "Who hath measured the waters in the hollow of his hand . . . . He shall feed his flock like a shepherd." And let me mark it again. "The Creator of the ends of the earth . . . . giveth power unto the faint." Almightiness offers itself to carry my burden! The Creator offers himself to recreate me! I can engage the forces of the universe to help me on my journey. Emerson counseled us to hitch our wagon to a star. We can do better than that. We can hitch it to the Maker of the star! We have something better than an ideal: we have the Light of the world. We are not left to a radiant abstraction; we have a gracious God.

The water flows from the Welsh hills to every house in Birmingha Rich and poor alike share the bounty of the mountains. The wealth of t mountains comes to the common thirst. And everybody, too, may ha water from the everlasting hills. "The water that I shall give him sh be in him." The river of life will flow to every soul of man.

SUNDAY, January 5. Psalm 148—"Praise ye the Lord." And t Psalmist calls upon the creation to join in the anthem. And that the gracious purpose of our God, that the world should be filled wi harmonious praise. It is his will that the character of man shou harmonize with the flowers of the field, that the beauty of h habits should blend with the glories of the sunrise, and that his spee and laughter should mingle with the songs of birds and with the melo of flowing streams. But man is too often a discord in creation. Tl flowers put him to shame. The birds make him sound harsh and jarrin He is "out of tune."

What then? "Tune my heart to sing Thy praise." We must bring th broken strings, the rusted strings, the jarring strings to the Repairer an Tuner of the soul. It is the glad ministry of his grace to reawaken sile chords, to restore broken harps, to "put new songs" in our mouths. H will make us the kinsfolk of all things bright and beautiful. We sha "go forth with joy," and "all the trees of the field shall clap their hands.

MONDAY, January 6. Genesis 2: 4-17—"And the Lord God too the man and put him into the garden to dress it and to keep it." And that is always the condition on which God gives his gardens we are to keep them by vigilant and diligent toil. Neglecte gardens run to waste. If we put nothing into them we shall find then become a diminishing treasury. A garden responds to our labor: ou strength is a partnership in its growth. Our toil is as requisite as sun shine and shower. "What more could I have done to my vineyard?" Sunshine and shower had been bountifully given, but men had been indo lent, and the vineyard became degenerate.

And so gardens are given by God to draw out the man. While we culti vate the garden we are educating ourselves. When we invest our talent we are enriching our characters. Thus we are making gardens of our selves. We are putting on our "beautiful garments." While we work we are being worked upon, and the loyalty of our labor adds kingliness to ou souls. Thank God for the gift that demands toil! It is a minister of health and salvation.

TUESDAY, January 7. Genesis 2: 18-24—"I will make him an helpmeet for him." And so from the very beginning has it been recorded that the soul needs fellowship. The good Lord has made us for one another. The solitary life is prone to turn inward and become dwarfed. The solitary bird loses the variety of its song: it needs a mate to call forth all its melodious fulness. And so it is that joys that are unshared lose their ecstasies: a joy is enhanced when another tastes it. Our very faith is confirmed by another's convictions. A fellow is a "help-meet," and a life of holy communion puts on strength and beauty.

And all this is true of the new-created life in Christ Jesus. It needs fellowship. The saint requires "the communion of saints." The solitary pilgrim needs the church. John Wesley used to say that no Christian went to heaven unaccompanied and alone! He meant that the heavenly life is one of comradeship, pilgrim being helpmeet to pilgrim along the varying way. "No man liveth to himself." "Forsake not the assembling of yourselves together." "The eye cannot say to the hand, I have no need of thee." "We are members one of another."

These daily meditations will appear in each issue throughout 1913.

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETINGS

NOTES ON THE CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR, EPWORTH LEAGUE AND BAPTIST YOUNG PEOPLE'S UNION TOPI

Become a Christian—Why Not?*

WHY not become a Christian?" Surely that is the most unanswerable question ever propounded to a human mind. Somebody has died and left you a bequest of a great fortune. Why not accept it? Somebody hears that you would like to take a college course and offers to give you a scholarship with all incidental expenses paid? Why not take it?

Why not accept Christ? His gladness, his salvation, his grace? Is there any reason in the world why you should not? We are constantly getting the wrong point of view in thinking about God and his plans for us. We keep thinking that he wants something from us, like that old lady Spurgeon tells us about in his fine book, All of Grace, and who was referred to a few weeks ago in a CHRISTIAN HERALD editorial. Her landlord stopped at her cottage door to give her a sovereign, you remember, and she thought he was after the rent and hid away because she had nothing to pay. So God comes to us holding out all sorts of pleasures and opportunities and assurances of safety, and we are afraid and run away. Why not take his gifts?

The business of becoming and being Christians and getting others to become Christians and helping them to be good Christians is the most important business in the world. Of course the great majority of the young people who will gather in the meetings have settled the question for themselves. The reason for choosing this topic is to persuade all the rest to make the great decision and to equip the members of the societies for the work of winning others to the Saviour. This "decision meeting" follows closely upon the Week of Prayer. There should be much prayer in preparation for it.

The Scripture lesson (Matt. 4: 17-25) tells the story of Jesus' first days at Capernaum. Some words are of special importance. "Repent" (v. 17); that is what every soul is asked to do. Christ asks us to give up nothing but our sins, and there can surely be no sane reason for refusing to do that. Sin is hideous; it is perilous. Turn from it to the Saviour. "Follow" (v. 19). We are to set ourselves in motion upon a clearly defined path. "F low me" (v. 19). Being a Christian merely mea going along with Jesus; that is truly delightf "Straightway" and "immediately" (verses 20 a 22). The reason many people do not accept Chr is simply that they have formed the habit hesitating about it. The thing to do is to rise i stantly and follow him. Don't consider the que tion any more; don't debate with yourself wheth you shan't wait till next time. You hear his ca There is only one thing to do—follow him. The is only one time to do it—now. The last verses t how Jesus brought health and joy to the torment and afflicted folks of Galilee.

Still Another Cardinal's Throne

N SUNDAY, November 24, Cardi- nal Farley presided "in cappa gna" (the golden mitre) at the sol- n high mass of the diamond jubilee ebration of St. Peter's Church, ughkeepsie, N. Y. From the Cath- News of November 30, we learn t the Pope's temporal power was nonstrated before the people in the rch by decorations of flags and eamers with the Papal colors [yel- and white] in the center. "At Gospel side of the altar was the dinal's throne, with his coat-of- is on the back. The cardinal was ted here during the service." An ort of 150 members of Florentine ncil, Knights of Columbus, es- ted him from Cataract Square to church, at which building he was eted by "five hundred children of parochial school, who waved small al flags."

"The First Catholic Nation"

READER of THE CHRISTIAN . HERALD has written calling our ention to an article which ap- red in our issue of October 23, 2 (not on the editorial page), the ter of which mistakenly attrib- d to Pope Pius X a statement ich should have been credited to ther Catholic source. It was to effect that every Catholic owed it the church as a duty to bend every rgy, "public, social and political," ard making this country the first tholic nation in the world." The iter evidently had in mind a pas- e from the Encyclical Letters of pe Leo XIII, in which it is declared be the duty of all Catholics "to make use of popular institutions . . . to bring back all civil society to the pattern and form of Christianity which We [the Pope] have described," and also the famous passage in Abbé Felix Klein's book, America of To-morrow (1911), describing the progress of the Church of Rome, which reads: "It may in a quarter of a century prevail over all the other confessions combined; it may make of the United States, according to a dream that is no longer merely visionary, the first Catholic nation of the world." Evidences are not wanting to show that the present Pope is as keenly appreciative as was his predecessor of the growth of Catholic influence in America. In an interview in Rome printed in the New York Times, December 30, 1911, he expressed his belief that one of the greatest achievements of that year was the "entrance of America into the comity of the great Catholic powers, through the creation of the three new American cardinals," an event which, from the Vatican's point of view (according to another cablegram in the same journal), gives America a place among "the first Catholic powers in the world." However, in justice to the record, we deem it a duty to give the facts in the case, crediting the expression in question to the exact source to which it belongs.

Protestantism Must Unite

ONE writer in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD exclaims "Oh for another Luther!" but I do not say that. I say "Oh for a united Protestantism!" That's where we are weak. We are divided. Some are Paul, some are Apollos. Some Methodists, some Presbyterians, some Baptists. Just so long as we are separated, so long will the Roman power advance with its blighting influences. When will Protestantism wake up and unite? T. H.

Notes from Roman Catholic Papers

—BECAUSE THE Cresco, Mich., township school trustees have ordered that school be opened with prayer, Charles Conroy, a Catholic, has refused to send his children to school. He was arrested by the truant officer, and says he will carry the case to the supreme court.—Cleveland Universe, November 15, 1912.

—MR. SPELLISSY made a report for the board of directors [United Irish-American Societies] which was accepted. The report for the committee on education was also made by Mr. Spellissy, who said they were working for the revision of the texts on English history. They had a promise that such revision would be made. However, as Superintendent Maxwell, though Irish himself, was not friendly to his people, they would have to continue their fight for the revision.—Irish-American, November 16, 1912.

Pastor Sheldon's New Book

MANY readers of this journal will welcome the appearance in book form of Dr. Charles M. Sheldon's latest story, A Builder of Ships. Under the title of Brander Cushing's Ambition, it appeared as a serial in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD a year ago, and afforded many delightful hours to the thousands who eagerly read every new story that comes from the gifted pen of the author of In His Steps. Pastor Sheldon has added to the strongly dramatic story of Brander Cushing an epilogue entitled, "Twenty-five Years After," which appears in the new book, adding greatly to its interest and completeness. A Builder of Ships is published by the George H. Doran Company, New York ($1.20).

The Death of a Popular Poet

On the afternoon of December 18, Will Carleton, the poet and philosopher, who has endeared himself by his quaint and homely poems to the hearts of the American people, died at his home in Greene Avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y. The late Mr. Carleton was born at Hudson, Lenawee County, Mich., on October 21, 1845. The log cabin in which he was born is the original of that described in "Out of the Old House, Nancy," and "When Kitchen and Parlor and Bedroom, they had 'em all in one." A more extended notice of Mr. Carleton's work and place in the hearts of the American public will appear in a forthcoming issue.

Cows Thrive and Owners Prosper in the San Joaquin Valley California

Here is the dairyman's opportunity. Conditions are just right for his business and there's a hungry market right at home. Great cities like San Francisco and Los Angeles make steady, profitable markets for fresh milk and dairy products. And think of the thousands who devote their time to orchard and vineyard, who have no room for cattle. And the other thousands devoted to mining and lumbering. The creameries paid an average of over 32 cents a pound last year for butter fat. Can you get as much where you are?

The 200,000 people now in the San Joaquin Valley have only made a beginning in developing its marvelous agricultural resources. Over seven million acres of wonderful crop-producing soil are awaiting the men who will set them at work. Your dollars will have greater earning power here; your brain and muscle will count for more.

The best of it is that you can buy this land with water developed, or with water rights, at about $125 an acre, on favorable terms. You can get quick results. Most of the land was wheat-fields or grazing land, and it is easily put into alfalfa. There's a creamery in nearly every hamlet which will sell you cows on time. Little shelter is required, as stock thrives out of doors the year around. There is no time that you can not do out-of-doors work comfortably and profitably.

You will find here good schools, good roads, telephones, rural delivery, electric light and power, trolleys, and a "get-together-and-help-each-other" spirit that makes the newcomer feel at home at once.

The Santa Fe has published a folder about the San Joaquin Valley which is filled with information for the homeseeker. It gives the experiences of people who have taken up different lines of farming, and tells of the results they have secured.

Read the book; then see the country. It will cost but little. Go now, while work is slack. The Santa Fe runs low-fare homeseekers' excursions to California, and elsewhere southwest, on first and third Tuesday each month. Time on the road, only three days from Chicago. I will gladly send the San Joaquin Valley folder free and give you full information about trains and fares.

"Yes, yes; well, there's one thing I know all right, and that is that I'm flat on my back right here this minute, and that I'm liable to stay here—till doomsday, I guess."

Pollyanna looked shocked.

"Oh, no! It couldn't be till doomsday, you know, when the angel Gabriel blows his trumpet, unless it should come quicker than we think it will—oh, of course, I know the Bible says it may come quicker than we think, but I don't think it will—that is, of course I believe the Bible; but I mean I don't think it will come as much quicker as it would if it should come now, and—"

John Pendleton laughed suddenly.

"Aren't you getting a little mixed?" he asked.

The little girl smiled.

"Maybe. But what I mean is that legs don't last—broken ones, you know—like lifelong invalids, same as Mrs. Snow has got. I should think you could be glad of that."

"Oh, I am," retorted the man, grimly.

"And you didn't break but one. You can be glad 'twasn't two." Pollyanna was warming to her task.

"Of course! So fortunate," sniffed the man, with uplifted eyebrow. "Looking at it from that standpoint, I suppose I might be glad I wasn't a centipede and didn't break fifty!"

Pollyanna chuckled.

"Oh, that's the best yet," she crowed. "I know what a centipede is! They've got lots of legs. And you can be glad about your money, you know—denying yourself, and saving it for the heathen. You see, I found out about it. Why, Mr. Pendleton, that's one of the ways I knew you weren't cross inside. Nancy told me."

The man's jaw dropped.

"Nancy told you I was saving money for the—well, may I inquire who Nancy is?"

"Our Nancy. She works for Aunt Polly."

"Aunt Polly! Well, who's Aunt Polly?"

"She's Miss Polly Harrington. I live with her."

The man made a sudden movement.

"Miss — Polly — Harrington!" he breathed. "You live with—her!"

"Yes; I'm her niece. She's taken me to bring up—on account of my mother, you know," faltered Pollyanna, in a low voice. "She was her sister. And after father—went to be with her and the rest of us in heaven, there wasn't any one left for me down here but the Ladies' Aid; so she took me."

The man's dark eyes lingered on her face. His lips curved in an odd smile. He hesitated, then went on: "But—you don't mean—you can't mean that it was Miss Polly Harrington who sent that jelly—to me?" he said slowly.

Pollyanna looked distressed.

"No, no, sir; she didn't. She said I must be very sure not to let you think she did send it. But I—"

"I thought as much," vouchsafed the man, shortly, turning away his head. And Pollyanna, still more distressed, tiptoed from the room.

Under the porte-cochère she found the doctor waiting in his gig. The nurse stood on the steps.

"Well, Miss Pollyanna, may I have the pleasure of seeing you home?" asked the doctor, smilingly. "I started to drive on a few minutes ago; then it occurred to me that I'd wait for you."

"Thank you, sir. I'm glad you did. I just love to ride," beamed Pollyanna, as he reached out his hand to help her in.

"Do you?" smiled the doctor. "Well, as near as I can judge, there are a good many things you 'love' to do, eh?" he added.

"Why, I don't know," Pollyanna laughed. "I reckon perhaps there are. I like to do 'most everything that's living. Of course I don't like the other things very well. But they aren't living."

"No? What are they, then?"

"Aunt Polly says they're 'learning to live,' sighed Pollyanna.

The doctor smiled now—a little queerly.

"Does she? Well, I should think she might say—just that."

"Yes," responded Pollyanna. "But I don't see it that way at all. I don't think you have to learn how to live. I didn't, anyhow."

The doctor drew a long sigh.

"After all, I'm afraid some of us—do have to, little girl," he said. Then for a time he was silent. Pollyanna, stealing a glance at his face, felt vaguely sorry for him. He looked so sad. She wished, uneasily, that she could "do something." It was this, perhaps, that caused her to say in a timid voice:

"Dr. Chilton, I should think being a doctor would be the very gladdest kind of a business there was."

The doctor turned in surprise.

"'Gladdest!' when I see so much suffering always, everywhere I go?" he cried.

She nodded.

"I know; but you're helping it—don't you see?—and of course you're glad to help it! And so that makes you the gladdest of any of us, all the time."

The doctor's eyes filled with sudden hot tears. The doctor's life was a singularly lonely one. He had no wife and no home save his two-room office in a boarding-house. His profession was very dear to him. Looking now into Pollyanna's shining eyes, he felt as if a loving hand had been suddenly laid on his head in blessing. He knew, too, that never again would a long day's work or a long night's weariness be quite without that newfound exaltation that had come to him through Pollyanna's eyes.

"God bless you, little girl," he said unsteadily. Then, with the bright smile his patients knew and loved so well, he added: "And I'm thinking, after all, that it was the doctor, quite as much as his patients, that needed a draught of that tonic!" All of which puzzled Pollyanna very much.

Pollyanna found her aunt in the sitting-room.

"Who was that man—the one who drove you into the yard, Pollyanna?" questioned the lady, a little sharply.

"Why, Aunt Polly, that was Dr. Chilton! Don't you know him?"

"Dr. Chilton! What was he doing—here?"

"He drove me home. Oh, and I gave the jelly to Mr. Pendleton, and—"

Miss Polly lifted her head quickly.

"Pollyanna, he did not think I sent it?"

"Oh, no, Aunt Polly. I told him you didn't."

Miss Polly grew a sudden vivid pink.

"You told him I didn't!"

Pollyanna opened wide her eyes at the remonstrative dismay in her aunt's voice.

"Why, Aunt Polly, you said to!"

Aunt Polly sighed.

"I said, Pollyanna, that I did not send it, and for you to be very sure that he did not think I did!—which is a very different matter from telling him outright that I did not send it." And she turned vexedly away.

"Dear me! Well, I don't see where the difference is," sighed Pollyanna, as she went to hang her hat on the one particular hook in the house upon which her aunt said that it must be hung.

llyanna was still revolving round round her aunt.

nd I never knew you had 'em! folks have 'em when you don't they've got 'em? Do you sup- I could?—'fore I get to heaven, I ," she cried, pulling out with r fingers the straight locks above ears.

Pollyanna, what does all this ?" demanded Aunt Polly, hurly removing her hat, and trying to th back her disordered hair.

No, no—please, Aunt Polly!" Polna's ecstatic voice turned to one of ressed appeal. "Don't smooth 'em It's those that I'm talking about ose darling little black curls. "You t know how pretty you look with hair like that! Oh, Aunt Polly, se, mayn't I do your hair like I did Snow's, and put in a flower? I'd ve to see how you'd look that way! Pollyanna!" Aunt Polly spoke very ply—all the more sharply because yanna's words had given her an throb of joy; when before had body cared how she or her hair ed? When before had anybody ed" to see her "pretty"? She put hand to her throat—the old helpfeeling was upon her, she knew.

llyanna began to dance up and n lightly on her toes.

You didn't!—you didn't say I dn't do your hair," she crowed triphantly; "and so I'm sure it means the other way round, sort of—it did the other day about Mr. dleton's jelly, you know. Now wait re you are—I'll get a comb."

But, Pollyanna, Pollyanna!" restrated Aunt Polly, following the e girl from the room, and panting airs after her.

Oh, did you come up here?" Pollya greeted her at the door of Miss y's own room. "Goody! That'll be r yet. I've got the comb. Now sit n, please, right here. Oh, I'm so l you let me do it!"

But, Pollyanna, I—I—"

Miss Polly did not finish her sene. To her helpless amazement she nd herself in the low chair before dressing-table, with her hair aldy tumbling about her ears under eager, but very gentle, fingers.

Oh, my! what pretty hair you've " prattled Pollyanna. Why, Aunt y, I'll make you so pretty everyy'll just love to look at you!"

Pollyanna!" gasped a stifled but cked voice from behind a veil of r. "I—I'm sure I don't know why letting you do this silly thing."

Why, Aunt Polly, I should think 'd be glad to have folks like to look you! Don't you like to look at tty things? I'm ever so much happ when I look at pretty folks, 'cause en I look at the other kind I'm so ry for them."

But—but—"

And I just love to do folks' hair," red Pollyanna, contentedly. Oh, nt Polly, I've just happened to think something! But it's a secret, and I n't tell. Now your hair is almost ie, and pretty quick I'm going to ve you just a minute; and you must mise, promise, promise! not to stir peek, even, till I come back. Now nember!" she finished, as she ran m the room.

Aloud Miss Polly said nothing. To rself she said that of course she uld at once undo the absurd work of her niece's fingers, and put her hair up properly again. At that moment—unaccountably—Miss Polly caught a glimpse of herself in the mirror of the dressing-table. And what she saw sent such a flush of rosy color to her cheeks that she only flushed the more at the sight.

She saw a face—not young, it is true—but just now alight with excitement and surprise. The cheeks were a pretty pink, and the eyes sparkled. The hair, dark, and still damp from the outdoor air, lay in loose waves about the forehead and curved back over the ears in wonderfully becoming lines, with softening little curls here and there.

So amazed and so absorbed was Miss Polly with what she saw in the glass that she quite forgot her determination to do over her hair, until she heard Pollyanna enter the room again. Before she could move, then, she felt a folded something slipped across her eyes and tied in the back.

"Pollyanna, Pollyanna! What are you doing?" she cried.

Pollyanna chuckled.

"That's just what I don't want you to know, Aunt Polly, and I was afraid you would peek, so I tied on the handkerchief. Now sit still. It won't take but just a minute, then I'll let you see."

"But, Pollyanna," began Miss Polly, struggling blindly to her feet, "you must take this off! You— Child, child! what are you doing?" she gasped, as she felt a soft something slipped about her shoulders.

Pollyanna only chuckled the more gleefully. With trembling fingers she was draping about her aunt's shoulders the fleecy folds of a beautiful lace shawl that she had found the week before when she and Nancy had been "regulating" the attic.

Her task completed, Pollyanna surveyed her work with eyes that approved, but that saw yet one touch wanting. Promptly, therefore, she pulled her aunt toward the sun parlor where she could see a belated red rose blooming on the trellis within reach of her hand.

"Pollyanna, what are you doing? Where are you taking me to?" recoiled Aunt Polly, vainly trying to hold herself back. "Pollyanna, I shall not—"

"It's just to the sun parlor—only a minute! I'll have you ready now quicker'n no time," panted Pollyanna, reaching for the rose and thrusting it into the soft hair above Miss Polly's left ear. "There!" she exulted, untying the knot of the handkerchief and flinging the bit of linen far from her.

"Oh, Aunt Polly, now I reckon you'll be glad I dressed you up!"

For one dazed moment Miss Polly looked at her bedecked self, and at her surroundings; then she gave a low cry and fled to her room. Pollyanna, following the direction of her aunt's last dismayed gaze, saw, through the open windows of the sun parlor, the horse and gig turning into the driveway, and the man who held the reins.

Delightedly she leaned forward.

"Dr. Chilton! Dr. Chilton! Did you want to see me? I'm up here."

"Yes," smiled the doctor, a little gravely. "Will you come down, please?"

Pollyanna found the doctor waiting in his gig.

"I've prescribed you for a patient, and he's sent me to get the prescription filled," announced the doctor. "Will you go?"

"You mean—an errand—to the drug store?" asked Pollyanna, a little uncertainly.

The doctor shook his head with a smile.

"Not exactly. It's Mr. John Pendleton. He would like to see you to-day, if you'll be so good as to come. It's stopped raining, so I drove down after you. Will you come? I'll call for you and bring you back before six o'clock."

"I'd love to!" exclaimed Pollyanna. "Let me ask Aunt Polly."

In a few minutes she returned, hat in hand, but with rather a sober face.

"Didn't—your aunt want you to go?" asked the doctor, a little diffidently, as they drove away.

"Y-yes," sighed Pollyanna. "She—she wanted me to go too much, I'm afraid. You see, she said: 'Yes, yes, run along, run along—do! I wish you'd gone before.' "

The doctor smiled—but with his lips only. His eyes were very grave. For some time he said nothing; then, a little hesitatingly, he asked:

"Wasn't it—your aunt I saw with you a few minutes ago—in the window of the sun parlor?"

Pollyanna drew a long breath.

"Yes; that's what's the whole trouble, I suppose. You see, I'd dressed her up in a beautiful lace shawl I found upstairs, and I'd fixed her hair and put on a rose, and she looked so pretty. Didn't you think she looked just lovely?"

For a moment the doctor did not answer. When he did speak his voice was so low Pollyanna could but just hear the words:

"Yes, Pollyanna, I—I thought she did look—just lovely."

AMONG THE WORKERS

—Rev. Dr. Arthur J. Smith has been re-elected superintendent of the Evangelistic Committee of New York City for another year.

—W. B. Mary, the traveling evangelist, is now on a long journey afoot across the continent. He preaches at every available point on the road where he can find an audience. He hopes to reach New York on his pedestrian tour in three years.

—Nmaa Blii, a young native Liberian, a student at the University of West Tennessee, would be glad to hear of some American patron interested in missions, who would be willing to assist him in procuring a medical education to equip him for work in Liberia. Any interested reader can obtain particulars on writing to The Christian Herald.

—A small donation was recently received by the Bowery Mission which is of peculiar interest. It was from a man in Westwood, N. J., about sixty years of age, who during the severe weather last winter was on the Bread Line, hungry, homeless and wretched. The Mission procured work for him at $12 per month. His salary has since been increased to $14. He gave a dollar to the Mission as an offering of gratitude, and to help other poor fellows who are less fortunate than himself.

—Dr. J. H. Romig, of Pioneer Hospital, Seward, Alaska, writes thanking The Christian Herald contributors to the fund for the relief of the Alaska sufferers by the eruption of Mount Katmai. He says: "We were aware that the government was providing for the food and clothing of the sufferers, but the care of the sick was more difficult and was the most urgent to which The Christian Herald contributions could be applied. You have helped to keep a boy from becoming blind and another from becoming a helpless cripple, as well as sending aid to those who could not be brought to the hospital for lack of funds. I thank you in behalf of the sufferers."

—Mrs. Elvira S. Steele has lately received wonderful letters of commendation from 152 of the most prominent and influential citizens of Chattanooga, Tenn., where she has resided for thirty years and labored as founder and manager of the Steele Home for Needy Children. One was from the mayor of the city, and others were from every member of the State Board of Commissioners, from five judges, from the State Senator and a Representative in Congress, from the editors of both local papers, from six lawyers, six clergymen, five teachers, five physicians, five railroad officials, real estate agents, merchants, insurance men, the county court officials, chief of police, chief of State detectives, etc. The county continues to appropriate funds to aid her in her running expenses. During twenty-nine years she has received and cared for 1,236 inmates, whom she has trained for a longer or shorter time and has sent the older ones off to sixty-eight different industrial schools, where she has paid their board, clothed them and borne their expenses. She has done this in order that they might become self-supporting.

to consider how absurd it is? To disobey God! What an utterly preposterous and insane proposition that is!

Whoever thinks of trying to disobey the law of gravity? The universe is held together by it; all the achievements even in aviation have been made by reckoning with it and by finding the relation of other laws to it. But to defy it; to walk out of a window and expect to tread the air; to let go of a book or a knife and expect it to go up instead of down—who is foolish enough to think of that? Who dares defy the laws of electricity, of momentum, of hydraulics? All these are laws of God and we bow to them. Yet by some woful blight of intellect man has gotten the idea that God's spiritual law he may accept or reject as he likes.

The Bible takes men as it finds them, foolishly ignoring these laws of the soul; it undertakes to lure them away from their folly by pointing out the delight of obeying God. The passages announced for our study this week give a most attractive program for those who set out to do God's will.

One of the rewards, the one to be particularly emphasized in our lesson, is the blessing of certainty. People complain that they cannot be sure about divine things. In a sadly large number of cases, it is because they are not willing to obey. "If any man willeth to do his will" [see Revised Version] "he shall know of the teaching." (John 7: 17). We must not lose sight of the fact that spiritual life and progress come by faith; but so long as we are unwilling to obey we cannot believe. A yielded will is the first step to salvation and blessing.

Acts 5: 32 announces that the Holy Spirit is given to those who obey God. That is his very choicest gift, his own Spirit to live, with all his strengthening and delightful comforts, in our souls. The interesting narrative of Matt. 12: 46-50 closes with the assurance that Christ will accept into most intimate fellowship every one who does his Father's will. "The same," he declared, "is my brother, and sister, and mother." John 4: 34 records the statement of Jesus that it was his "meat" to do God's will. Real nourishment for the life comes from obeying God. Make a study of the word delight, noting particularly Ps. 40: 8.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

Letter Bible), while the "garden eastward in Eden" was a small portion of this region at the head of the Persian Gulf. Missionaries who have labored many years in that region testify of the perfection of climate and the beauty of the scenery. It has been said, "Here center ethnology, geography, philology and tradition. Here are the primitive forms of the domestic animals. Here and hereabouts other religions, as well as the worship of the true God, can properly be considered as arising."

"Dress it and keep it," were the words which God spoke to Adam concerning his first home, the most beautiful spot on earth. It would take the head of a man beclouded with laziness to imagine that God thus laid a hard and bitter bondage about Adam. When Jesus was in this world, he said: "My Father worketh even until now, and I work" (John 5: 17). We can not conceive that this great universe in all its parts keeps on moving without the oversight and handiwork of God. And surely when Jesus was in this world, he taught men and healed them to the limit of his strength, so that he was often obliged to go aside and rest awhile. Then it follows that after the pattern he has set, work must be divine.

The two greatest human characters in the Bible are Moses and Paul; the first was a shepherd, and the second was a tent-maker. Neither of them murmured because he had to work, but they enjoyed the fellowship into which they were brought, particularly Paul, who wrought with Aquila and Priscilla in sweet companionship. Hon. Carroll D. Wright, former United States Commissioner of Labor, wrote in a letter to me: "The more I examine and study the various phases of the labor question, the more thoroughly I am convinced that it is only by the adoption in business life of the body of principles known as the Christian religion that there can be any satisfactory solution, or even progress." Labor is a blessing, not a curse, only as a man or a woman ill-naturedly makes it so. Mr. Powderly, when chief of the Knights of Labor, said: "Adam was divinely appointed to the duties of a gardener, not as a curse, but before the fall."

STEADY HAND

A Surgeon's Hand Should Be the Firmest of All.

"For fifteen years I have suffered from insomnia, indigestion and nervousness as a result of coffee drinking," said a surgeon the other day. (Tea is equally injurious because it contains caffeine, the same drug found in coffee).

"The dyspepsia became so bad that I had to limit myself to one cup at breakfast. Even this caused me to lose my food soon after I ate it.

"All the attendant symptoms of indigestion, such as heart burn, palpitation, water brash, wakefulness or disturbed sleep, bad taste in the mouth, nervousness, etc., were present to such a degree as to incapacitate me for my practice as a surgeon.

"The result of leaving off coffee and drinking Postum was simply marvelous. The change was wrought forthwith, my hand steadied and my normal condition of health was restored." Name given upon request. Read the famous little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a reason."

Postum now comes in concentrated, powder form, called Instant Postum. It is prepared by stirring a level teaspoonful in a cup of hot water, adding sugar to taste, and enough cream to bring the color to golden brown.

Instant Postum is convenient; there's no waste; and the flavour is always uniform. Sold by grocers—50-cup tin 30 cts., 100-cup tin 50 cts.

OUR YOUNGER READERS

A HAPPY NEW YEAR

DEAR BOYS AND GIRLS: I love to think that the "Happy New Year," which we are all saying at this time, really means that a New Year has begun. Hidden away in the stinging cold and beneath the frost and the snow, the life-spark of a brand new year is kindling. The trees, the flowers, the grasses and the fruits, all are feeling its magic touch. Birds and fishes, animals, insects, and every living thing respond to the New Year, and before long we shall be seeing manifestations of it in the earliest peep of the spring.

Good luck and joyful days to you, my dears. Do not bother your brains with trying to keep too many New Year resolutions. Make one good one—to keep your room in order, for instance—and stick to it with all your might. One small resolve firmly kept day after day is worth a dozen pledges half kept, and in the end neglected entirely.

To Learn by Heart

Somebody did a golden deed;
Somebody proved a friend in need;
Somebody sang a beautiful song;
Somebody smiled the whole day long;
Somebody thought, "'Tis sweet to live";
Somebody said, "I am glad to give";
Somebody fought a brave good fight;
Somebody helped to do what's right.

Was one of those somebodys you?

SOME NICE WORK BY OUR BOYS AND GIRLS

A Twelfth-Night Party

OUR club, the Happy Hearts, is giving a Twelfth-Night Party on January 6, and this is the last merry-making before we shall all be going back to boarding-school. We will be doing many nice things together on that evening, but best of all are the tableaux we have gotten up. We start off with the Three Wise Men, and then there will be four tableaux out of the Old Testament—The Visit of the Queen of Sheba to King Solomon, David the Shepherd Boy, Esther Made Queen, and the Shunammite's Son—and father says he will tell the stories of the pictures for us. The other tableaux are all funny ones, for our mothers agree that our party must be a merry one. We are going to play old-fashioned games, and have a Twelfth-Night cake. The outside of the cake is going to be a large bonnet-box, the top covered with frosting, and candles will lift off, and in it there will be as many scalloped cup cakes as there are guests at the party. In each cake there will be a thimble or a coin, a penny, a ring, a button, or a bean. Those who find rings will be wedded first; the thimbles portend late marriages; the pennies stand for riches; the buttons for bachelors, and the beans fortell a long journey.

Thank you for suggesting a Twelfth-Night Party to the Happy Heart Club. We all wish the Cozy Corner boys and girls a happy New Year.

MARY KENNEDY, President.
California.

I Made It Myself

OUT of a piece of sole-leather about 5½ inches square, which I cut into a circle and soaked until it was soft, I made a dandy sucker. I beveled the edge very thin, and without cutting through the leather I bored a horizontal hole in the top of it just large enough to force a strong string through. I can stick that leather disk onto a brick or a flat stone, and walk off with it. This is a pretty experiment.

JOSEPH BROWN.
Connecticut.

Every boy ought to make a sucker, remembering it is the air pressure, fifteen or sixteen pounds to the square inch, that holds the leather to the stone.

Marine Telescope

MAKE an oblong narrow box out of four pieces of quarter-inch board about two feet long by sixteen inches wide, and fit a piece of clear, clean glass across one end, held in place by brass-headed tacks driven into the wood and overlapping the glass. Fill all the cracks with sealing wax to keep out the light. Then plunge the glass end two or three inches into the water and look through the open end. This simple marine telescope is made on the principle of the more elaborate glasses through which to look at the famous gardens under the sea near the Catalina Islands.

"Where Is Little People's Corner?"

In Wintertime

The sky is gray and all is still;
The trees are bare; hushed is the rill
In wintertime.

The ground is bare, brown is the mead;
The flowers sleep; the leaves are dead
In wintertime.

But I think, after adding all things together,
The good God sends the cheeriest weather
In wintertime.

A Single-Runner Sled

SCHOOL boys and girls in the hills of Maine and Vermont have great sport with single-runner sleds which have some advantage, in the simplicity of their construction, over the jumper coaster, which carries two runners near together and is built somewhat higher. The "single-runner" is a piece of hard wood two and a half or three inches thick by fifty or sixty inches long, and three and a half inches high, on the under side of which is fastened tire-iron or strap iron, which soon becomes smooth as glass. Upon this runner they fit an upright eight or ten inches high by ten or twelve inches wide with a small seat on the top. On this very stoutly-built but somewhat precarious "flyer" they cleverly balance themselves with arms and feet, and the rapidity and dexterity with which they coast down long hillsides without losing their balance is almost incredible.

To Remember

DO NOT forget the guaranteed gold-faced gunmetal watch, the first-class kodak and the fifty supplementary prizes in order of merit to be awarded for articles in less than 400 words describing some simple toy or useful article, and how to make it. THE next time you are brightening up things about the house, consider the piano. Is the woodwork dull and lusterless? Are the keys soiled and discolored? You can wash the piano just as safely and satisfactorily as you can wash the furniture if you use Ivory Soap and follow these directions:

To Clean the Woodwork

Dissolve a quarter of a small cake of Ivory Soap, shaved fine, in a pint of boiling water. When lukewarm apply with a soft sponge. Rinse with cold water, using another soft sponge. Dry with a damp chamois. Wash a small section at a time. Do not allow water to dry on the surface.

To Clean the Keys

Dip a clean, soft cloth, in tepid water and wring almost dry. Rub on a cake of Ivory Soap and wipe off the keys. Polish at once with a damp chamois.

Clean the woodwork once a month, the keys once a week, and you can keep your piano like new.

IVORY SOAP, because of its mildness, purity and freedom from alkali, cannot mar the finish. Because of its freedom from excessive oil, it rinses easily and does not leave a film upon the surface. The dirt which obscures the finish is removed so that the original polish of the woodwork is restored and the keys appear as white as when new.

HOW I CLIMBED MOUNT ARARAT

THE STORY OF AN ASCENT TO THE HIGHEST PEAK AND WHAT WE FOUND THERE

BY PROFESSOR EDGAR J. BANKS

IF YOU would look on the map at the place where the three great empires of Turkey, Persia and Russia meet, there you would find Mount Ararat. It is in an out-of-the-way part of the world, where the traveler seldom goes. From Babylon, or from Jerusalem, or from Constantinople, it is a journey of more than a month away. But the traveler who does visit Ararat is well repaid, for not only may he see the place where the Biblical story of the flood tells us the ark of Noah rested, and where life began anew after the deluge, but he sees as beautiful mountainous scenery as may be found in any part of the world. Ararat rises like a great pyramid directly from the low valley of the Araxes, or from about two thousand feet above sea level, to the enormous height of 17,260 feet. The upper several thousand feet of its summit are capped with snow even in the hottest of summers, while the people about its base seem to be sweltering in the heat of a furnace. The air is so clear, and distances seem so short, that one might fancy he could climb to the snow-capped peak in an hour or two, yet the mountain lifts that peak into the air more than three miles.

The history of Ararat is somewhat obscure. One Biblical passage merely says the ark of Noah rested there; another tells us that the sons of Sennacherib, after murdering their father, fled to Ararat for safety. The Assyrian inscriptions mention Ararat frequently, but instead of referring to a single peak, they apply that name to the entire mountain range. Some early Christian writers speak of Ararat as the valley of the Araxes, but at least as long ago as the Middle Ages the name was given to a definite peak. It seems likely that from ancient times the peak has been called Ararat, and so prominent was the mountain that it gave its name to the surrounding country. The Armenians living about its base call it Massis; the Turks call it Egri Dagh, or crooked mountain, because of its double summit; but the Russians, in whose territory it stands, know it by its ancient name.

Ararat, for the name applies to a small range of mountains, may be said to have three peaks, each standing at the corner of an equilateral triangle, the sides of which are about seven miles long. The peak to the west, Big Ararat, completely overshadows the others, yet it is only when seen from twenty miles or more away that its great height is evident. Its entire summit is always covered with snow, and great snow fields extend for miles down its slope, but so steep are they that to climb them would be nearly impossible. In the hollows, far down the sides, the snow lies deep, and streams of ice-cold water go rushing down among the rocks. On the eastern side a glacier a mile long slowly makes its way down to the precipice below, and still farther down are black lava beds formed when Ararat was an active volcano. Several small extinct craters appear on the sloping sides.

Many have sought to climb Ararat, but few have succeeded. To the people about its base, Christians and Moslems alike, Ararat is sacred; they believe that none should even attempt to climb it, nor do they believe that any may ever reach the summit. The Armenians say that centuries ago a priest named Jacob sought to ascend the mountain, but whenever he would reach a certain height he would always fall asleep, and when he awoke he would find himself back at the base. Finally, so earnestly did he pray that he might reach the summit, his prayer was granted. On the top of Ararat, so tradition says, he found the ark. From the ark he took down a plank and some of the pitch with which the ark was smeared. The plank is said to have been shown in a little monastery at Aghurri on the northern slope until 1840, when the village was destroyed by an earthquake. The pitch was sought for medicinal purposes. It is still believed that since the days of Jacob none have ascended the mountain, and that none ever can.

The first authentic ascent of Ararat was made in 1829 by a Frenchman named Parrot. He succeeded in reaching the summit, and though he wrote a book describing his ascent, his story was doubted. In 1834, Aftonamof, a Russian astronomer, climbed to the summit, for he believed that from there the stars were visible at noon, and he would prove his theory. The Shah of Persia offered a reward to any who would climb the mountain, but none ever claimed it. A Turk once attempted to climb it on horseback, but he went scarcely beyond the foothills. However, in recent years several ascents have been made; that of Mr. James Bryce, the British ambassador, in 1876, has been the best described. The last ascent, the only one during 1912, was made on August 20 by the present writer.

With one companion, Dr. Gibson of Chicago, I had been traveling in the old kingdom of Georgia, and early in August we had come to Erivan, the nearest large town to the north of Ararat. It is only in August or early in September that the mountain may be climbed. Ice axes were made by the local blacksmiths; shoes were fitted with sharp nails, and provisions were purchased. Then the Russian officials refused us permission to climb the mountain, for at the time it was under military supervision. However, we started for the mountain, and from the little village of Alikizil, at the northern base, we drove in an ox team up the foothills. The road, in places filled with great boulders thrown from the mountain by the earthquakes, was nearly

CHRISTMAS AT THE BOWERY MISSION

CHRISTMAS festivities at the Mission were inaugurated this year in a somewhat unusual manner on Sunday, December 22.

Dr. G. B. Richards, the celebrated optometrist of Elizabeth, N. J., who has for many years been one of the most ardent workers, came this year, bringing a novel Christmas present. He appeared at the Sunday morning meeting, delivering a stirring address, and then devoted the hours of the afternoon to examining the eyes of those men who needed professional advice. It is impossible to imagine a greater boon or blessing than this to the many sufferers who availed themselves of his kindness. The promise of restored good sight brought to many the happiest kind of Christmas.

At the Sunday evening meeting the principal feature was a talk by Mr. Arthur J. Statham, the Bowery Mission agent for the Christmas distribution of dinners to poor families. The aim of the Mission in giving the dinners is not only to bestow them upon poor people, but the absolutely poorest and most needy that can be found. Very touching, even harrowing, were some of the stories told by Mr. Statham. The most surprising feature of the scenes of poverty that he had witnessed was the heroic optimism of some of the sufferers. A widow supporting herself and five children on $2 a week, and describing herself as "a lucky woman," because she had a landlady who only demanded as much rent as she was able to pay; a young woman with a nine-months-old baby, an aged mother, and three children, and a husband in the hospital, and supporting the whole family by washing, living in one room, which was full of wet clothes at the time of Mr. Statham's visit; a couple over seventy years of age, the old man in bed suffering with rheumatism, and his wife making a dollar a week selling newspapers, and in the midst of such galling need maintaining a cheerful spirit—these were some of the many illustrations of serenity amid suffering given by Mr. Statham in his remarkable address. Bright and early there came to the Mission on Christmas morning the 120 selected to receive the baskets, each of which contained dinner for about eight people.

In the early hours of the Christmas morning, immediately after the Bread Line Breakfast, a meeting was held especially for homeless men. This was an agreeable and welcome surprise. The poor fellows had come trooping in, shivering and downhearted, expecting to receive the roll and coffee and then spend the rest of the Christmas morning in the streets. Instead of that, cheery-voiced men grasped them by the hand, gave them a hearty Christmas greeting, and invited them to stay an hour or two. The little hand organ was brought out, hymn books distributed, and soon the room rang with the hymns. Then one after another told how the Christ had come into their hearts and lives just as surely as that the Babe came into the Bethlehem manger nearly two thousand years ago.

The annual Christmas dinner and meeting were of the usually enthusiastic kind. Hours before the doors opened a long line of men, four deep, was formed. Before seven o'clock they had filled the hall. Seven or eight hundred of the men still left in line in the street were then admitted to the breakfast room below, where they were greeted by the warm smell of coffee, and the huge pile of boxes, in each of which was a Christmas dinner. This consisted of turkey, pie, crullers and fruit. How we wish sometimes that our generous CHRISTIAN HERALD readers who furnish these Bowery Mission repasts could see these men eat! They are hungry, and no mistake. After these feasts there are no "fragments." There is never anything "left over," and in many of these poor, discordant lives the "chords that were broken vibrate once more" as they realize they have not been altogether forgotten at the Christmas time. The meeting in the Auditorium was a genuine Christian family affair. Enthusiastic singing, homely talks, Christmas stories, thrilling testimonials, formed the program of one of the happiest and best of Bowery Mission Christmases.

impassable. The first night we slept at Aghurri, a modern town of mud huts built near the site of the place which was destroyed by the earthquake of 1840. The chief of the village, an aged Kurd, told us of that day, when Ararat was shaken to its foundations. Suddenly, without any warning, the northern side of the mountain fell upon the village. Every one of its two hundred houses was buried deep by the rocks, and, save for two men who happened to be away from home for the day, not a soul escaped. Rocks weighing thousands of tons were hurled for miles down the mountainside. The vineyards were ruined. The willow trees, which were said to have sprung from the planks of the ark, the grapevine which Noah himself planted, and the shrine of St. Jacob, were all destroyed. Now, in the depths of the gorge thus formed, reaching almost to the very heart of the mountain, is a fountain to which pilgrims resort, and its sacred waters are carried far and wide to heal diseases, and to destroy the locusts which devour the crops of the peasants.

The second day's journey brought us to Sadar Bulak, near the ridge connecting the two Ararats. There, about 8,800 feet high, the Kurds pasture their flocks in the summer time, for then the mountain slopes are green with grass. There the more prosperous Kurds come to escape the heat of the valley; there too is the military post which has the control of Ararat. Again of the local authorities we sought permission to climb the mountain, and after some delay it was granted, but only with the condition that we be accompanied by a guide and men appointed by the commander of the post.

On the morning of August 18, with the guide and seven men to carry our blankets and provisions, we started up the peak. For the first two hours horses bore us over the rough slope, until they could go no farther, and they were returned to the post. Even there we found shepherds with their flocks of sheep and goats, and they brought us bowls of milk to drink. Great heaps of rough blocks of hard, black diorite, which cover the mountainside, made progress slow. Down deep among the rocks we could hear the trickling streams of melted snow. Here and there mountain flowers found enough soil to take root, and though many of the varieties were strange to me, the most beautiful of all were the little clusters of forget-me-nots. Once we saw the footprints of a bear which had come to a spring to drink; frequently we heard the call of a mountain bird, but these were the only signs of life. That night we slept at the height of 11,000 feet, among the stones close by a snow bank.

The climb of the next day was fatiguing. Though their burdens were very light, the men complained, and once they threatened to return. The rocks grew rougher, and the grade steeper. At the height of twelve thousand feet the air became so rare that it was difficult to breathe, and more than half of the time was spent in resting. Finally the peak of Little Ararat appeared on the level with us, and then below us, while the lower mountains and hills seemed as if they were a level plain. That night, surrounded by stones which were piled up to break the wind, among the snow fields and the clouds, about fourteen thousand feet high, we slept. The air was bitterly cold; the wind blew a gale, and the men, even in their long, thick Russian coats, were too cold to sleep.

At daylight August 20, the clouds were about and below us. Occasionally for an instant the wind would blow them away, revealing the peak of Little Ararat two thousand feet below, and above us the head of Big Ararat towered three thousand feet, apparently as distant as from the valley below. There were great snow fields and almost perpendicular rocks over which we must climb. The men, shivering with cold, refused to go farther; the guide despaired of reaching the summit. We broke the ice from a dish of tea to drink for our breakfast, and started on the upward climb. The clouds surrounded us the most of the way. In places the rocks were so steep that we climbed on our hands and knees. To breathe became more and more difficult, yet we dared not stop long to rest. We followed along a ridge of rocks by the edge of a steep snow field for two thousand feet, and then the slope became less steep, but the small, loose porphyry stones, mixed with ashes, made progress difficult. The strong odor of sulphur filled the air, causing the guide to complain of a headache. One of the pack men, braver than the rest, overtook us, but he was sick from the great height. We climbed up still another thousand feet, and then finally, after six hours, we stepped upon the snowfield of the summit. The very peak of Ararat, a quarter of a mile away, was scarcely two hundred feet above us.

Quickly we hurried over the snowfield up to the peak, but there we did not remain long, for the strong wind chilled us through. There are two summits to Ararat. On the highest we were standing when suddenly the wind blew the clouds away, revealing the other summit before us. We hurried down into the valley between them, for there tradition says the ark rested and used to be visible on clear days, even from the valley below, but we found only deep hard snow.

Several years ago Russian officials climbed the mountain to place upon poles on its summit a wooden box containing a book, that all who reached it might write their names. The wind had broken the poles and hurled the box down; we found it half buried in the snow. The Russian flag, which once waved above the box, was in tatters. Near by was a stone heap. Search among its stones revealed a bottle and a rusty tin box, in which were scraps of paper bearing the names of those who had climbed the mountain before us. Of the half dozen names I saw, all were in Russian.

The view from so high a mountain is seldom the best. The horizon on all sides seemed to tip up, as if the world were a great deep dish, and we were standing on a knob in the center. The villages below were hardly visible. On the clearest of days the Black Sea to the west, and the Caspian to the east, might have been seen, but we were surrounded only by a distant haze.

Three days had been required for the ascent from Sadar Bulak; only one was needed for the descent. An hour on the summit chilled us through, and so we slid down over the loose stones and ashes near the summit. In two hours we rejoined our companions, but so weary were we that we fell exhausted to the ground.

A few days later, at the base of the mountain, in the little Russian village of Igdir, we were sipping tea in the public garden, when an aged Armenian approached.

"Whence did you come?" he asked.

"From America."

"Why did you come?" he continued.

"To see Ararat and to climb to its summit," was our reply.

"That may never be, for no man may see the summit of the sacred mountain."

"But, effendi, we have already seen the very summit of the mountain."

The old man's mouth fell open, and he stared at us strangely.

"God keep your tongue from such falsehood!" he said.

Then from my pocket I took a large paper, written in Russian, with the government seal and the signature of the commander of the army post of Sadar Bulak at the bottom, and I explained to him that it was evidence that I had reached the summit of the mountain. He merely shook his head, and mumbling his unbelief, went away.

THE AFTERMATH OF WAR IN THE BALKANS

$4,000 SPEEDS TO AID THE SUFFERERS. RELIEF WORKERS TELL OF CONDITIONS IN THE DEVASTATED VILLAGES

THE conference of delegates from the various Balkan States, which is now in session in London, spent the first few days in that preliminary skirmishing which the Turkish plenipotentiaries forced upon the gathering in accordance with the cherished traditions of Oriental diplomacy. It was not until the day before Christmas that the allies laid their formal territorial demands and conditions upon the table. These demands are in brief as follows:

First, The cession by Turkey of all the territory west of a line starting from a point east of Rodosto, on the Sea of Marmora, to a point in the Bay of Malatra, on the Blaek Sea, and excluding the peninsula of Gallipoli; Albania's status to be deeided by the powers.

Second, The cession of the Ægean Islands occupied by the Greek forees in the present war, including Rhodes, and of the eleven islands oceupied by the Italians in the recent war.

Third, The cession to Greeee of all Turkish rights in the Island of Crete.

Up to the beginning of the New Year the Turks had made no official counter-proposals, though they stated unofficially that they wished to retain that section of Thrace in which Adrianople is situated, and to convert the remainder of their former empire into autonomous states under the suzerainty of the Sublime Porte.

The members of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Relief Committee at Sofia are putting forth their best efforts in aid of the destitute, who, as the winter advances, are becoming more and more numerous. Pastor Furnajieff writes from Sofia as follows:

"Last week we conferred with Mr. Noel Buxton of the Balkan Committee of London about the growing need and how best to co-operate to meet it. Mr. Ludskanoff, the Minister of the Interior, met us twice to lend all the aid he could to our efforts. He stated his gratification and appreciation of the relief work. The statistical facts show the greatest need just inside the border line of Macedonia, where the first engagements took place. The minister's office informed us that there are scores of thousands in that district who need food, shelter and clothing. In the section north of Gumurdjina the villages have been burned in large numbers and the country devastated, and there are now 50,000 people that must be fed lest they die.

"In the district of Pashmakla most of the villages are in ashes. The inhabitants fled to the mountains but are now returning, many of them almost naked and all desperately hungry. Their houses are torn down or burned and their store of provisions are all gone. As the refugees return they are quartered in what houses are left, but when the actual owners appear the new occupants have to leave; so many are now housed in the schools and deserted Turkish barracks. In Tsarevo Selo, of which I have written before, there are at present seventeen hundred people living as one big family in the large rooms of the barracks. This would have proved a splendid temporary arrangement, but an epidemic of a malignant form of measles has appeared and is spreading rapidly. There have been several deaths already.

"Around Devlen there are several villages entirely burned out. The returning inhabitants, Christian and Mohammedan together, finding their houses gone, crowd into the larger towns. It is making a splendid impression on the Turkish inhabitants that relief is being distributed to them the same as to the Christians. A vast number of these Mohammedans are Pomaks, that is, the descendants of a once Christian mountain tribe who, at the time they were conquered by the Turks, were forced to accept Islam. We are trying to make the best of the opportunity we have at this time to show them the vast difference between the spiritual and economic development under the religion of their forefathers and under the creed of Mohammed.

"THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers have already gladdened the hearts of many hungry folk. Now Mr. Atanasoff, the treasurer of the committee, and I are on our way to the town of Djumaya. There we expect to find about five thousand refugees living in the barracks and barns. This town, once well known for its abundant grain supply, is left almost entirely without provision of any kind. The retreating Turkish army, here as in many other places, burned the food stores and devastated all they could as a means of checking the progress of the Bulgarians.

"The orphans of the war are increasing in numbers at an appalling rate. The picture which I enclose of the four Macedonian orphans of one family has a sadder tale connected with it than appears. The mother of these children died just before the war as a result of sufferings endured under the inhuman rule of Turkey in Macedonia. The father of these children left as a volunteer to join the army that is besieging Adrianople, and no one knows whether he is still living or not. The children have been existing for the last few weeks motherless, fatherless, barefooted, bareheaded, without wood, bedding or sufficient clothing for the biting cold of this winter weather." (The picture to which Mr. Furnajieff refers was too indistinct to reproduce satisfactorily on this page.)

Queen Eleanor (in Gray Suit), with Medical Officers and a Group of Volunteer Nurses

As rapidly as the gifts of our readers reach THE CHRISTIAN HERALD office they are being forwarded to Sofia for the use of the committee. This week another remittance has gone forward to relieve the growing distress. This last splendid contribution that we have been enabled to send will be used specially for the relief of women and children. A total of $9,250 has now been forwarded.

Many of the letters which bring the contributions of our readers give the sincere hopes and prayers of the senders for the speedy relief of the suffering. M. C., writing from Iowa City, says: "Please use the enclosed to help the women and poor little children to tide over this winter. I am deeply thankful that so many are interested and are willing to help them in their need. May God bless THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for its share in the work and for all it has done in the past for suffering humanity." A quotation from just one more letter; it gives the spirit of so many that come into the office that it might be taken as a type of all of them. The letter is written from Farnham, P. Q., Can., and reads as follows: "Please accept this mite to aid in the relief of the poor and suffering in the Balkans. I wish I were able to send more, but in the name of the Master this may at least give a cup of cold water unto one of his little ones."

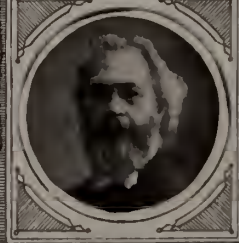
CHRIST OUR MASTER



A SERMON

BY

Rev. C. H. Parkhurst, D.D.*

TEXT: "Ye call me Master; and ye say well; for so I am." John 13: 13

IN OUR estimate of Christian truth we naturally place the emphasis upon those points that are most congenial to our intellectual tendencies and that are most considerate of our moral infirmities. If, therefore, you are acquainted with the mental caliber or mental eccentricities of a person, you will be able to judge pretty accurately in advance what will be the intellectual complexion of his religious convictions; and if you are informed as to the moral tone of a person, you will not probably be widely astray in your opinion as to what one of the moral aspects of Christian truth will be especially cherished by him. We find in the Bible what we look for and we look for the thing that we want.

What Ye Seek, Ye Shall Find

So that although the Scriptures that are given for our guidance are somewhat exacting, there is nevertheless a way of getting along with them that saves us inconvenience, and that at the same time leaves us feeling that we are rather faithfully squaring ourselves to the obligations that the Scriptures impose; something as a boy, who attends one of those colleges where the optional system prevails, feels, upon graduation, that he has squared himself to the college curriculum even though there be nothing in which he has shown himself so studious as in his selection of those studies that least require him to be studious, and that are curved to the bent of his undisciplined mentality.

Now there are two aspects under which the character and mission of Jesus Christ can be contemplated—aspects which although not mutually contradictory of course, are nevertheless so dissimilar that one and the same person rarely adopts both of the two, in their completeness, into his conception of Christ's import and office-work. And which of the two one will adopt depends largely, as already intimated, upon one's intellectual equipment and moral bias.

But that is scarcely the worst part of the difficulty. It is not so much brain as it is disposition that has trouble in coming to such a conception of Christ as takes in his entire character, and as thus can render one's Christianity an all-the-way-round Christianity. A fractional Christ will not yield a whole Christian. And it is the rather common habit of using such part of him as we can understand most easily and as we like best, that explains why it is that so many of us Christians are so imperfectly Christian, and why it is that the Christianities of different Christians get along so uncomfortably with each other and contrast so awkwardly with each other.

Christ as Lover and as Master

The complementary aspects under which Christ is contemplated are those of Christ as a Lover and Christ as a Master—the revealed affection of God and the revealed kingship of God. It is nature to love to be loved and it is not nature to love to be governed. So that the double aspect becomes difficult for us to adopt not simply because of the strain to the mind, but because one of the aspects frets the disposition. And while the kingliness of Christ frets the disposition, because the imposition of another's will is always irksome, the affection of Christ humors the disposition because it offers an apparent escape from our deserts and operates as a sedative salve upon our bruised conscience.

The doctrine of God's love is the popular doctrine that it is, not simply because love is a quality that stimulates in the heart a sense of moral beauty, but because love, when divinely exercised, is thought of as a kind of insurance policy taken out against possible calamity. So that there is produced this singular and incompatible situation, that while love and selfishness are diametrically opposed to each other we are caught admiring God's love for selfish reasons. So that while a preacher can always count upon being contemplated with lenient consideration when he expatiates upon God's tenderness he knows that he will have to take things just as they come when he lays the emphasis of his exposition upon the doctrine of God's kingliness and Christ's mastership.

And yet I am bound to believe that there is in us all a certain quality that is not quite satisfied with any conception of God that lays itself out entirely upon his attribute of loving kindness. If we consult what are our truest thoughts in the matter, I am sure that a religion which contents itself with being only a celebration of the love of God leaves in us an unsatisfied spot, an unfilled niche, a consciousness more or less distinct that however beautiful a thing the love is, there is something missing that is needed in order that the love itself may be as fine a thing as it is capable of being.

The appearance is—let me say furthermore—that the virile side of current Christianity is to a considerable extent a rather missing quantity. It is feminine rather than masculine, and is suffering because it is not both. Christ as the Lover, rather than Christ as the Master, is the uppermost thought—the blossom without the twig that it is supported upon. And men with any robustness of character would take offense at any such conception of the one-sided sweetness of God's thought toward us were it not—as already indicated—that it is in God's love that our hope of safety lies, just as it is the moral dignity of God and his holy masterfulness that constitutes our danger. If God were nothing but love there would be no danger; and if there were in him only will and holy mastery there would be no hope.

Religious Invertebracy

So even at the expense of believing in a God that has not holy dignity sufficient to make his affection creditable, men will skip the virility of God and attach themselves only to his plastic femininеness; very much as a boy who has been doing wrong will try and arrange things with his mother and carefully keep out of the way of his father, and yet is never quite a complete boy unless he stands loyally beneath the combined pressure of the joint parentage.

The prevalence of that easy fractional way of conceiving of God's character, together with the results of religious invertebracy flowing therefrom, has come about in part as a reaction against the exclusively hard way in which God used to be contemplated. And the trouble with this reaction, as with reactions generally, is that they never know when they have gone far enough. Old school theology was given to photographing God under the pose of a despot who was consumed with a sense of his own glory, and who was so poor in the affectional qualities of his nature as to have only sufficient love wherewith to effect the salvation of here and there one of what might have been supposed to be his children. Old-schoolism naturally engendered a reactionary new-schoolism; and if old-schoolism was hard, its reaction in the shape of new-schoolism has shown a good deal of disposition to be soft. And he only is a safe or complete believer who saturates conservative solidity with an infusion of tender benignity.

Now in all our pulpit deliverances theoretical interest in such matters as this does not count. Our objective point ought to be, and is, to discover that nucleus in the man, that constituent center, which is determinative of the man, and which denotes what he is fundamentally. You may be thoroughly apprised of the volume of a man's affection and yet not know the man. Those affections are not a reliable index of his moral latitude and longitude. They do not fix for you his exact position in the moral universe. They do not safely indicate the man's actual worth.

At a spot deeper in the man than his affections is his will, and while his love may be tender his will may be hard, which means that he may be affectionate but unrighteous, full of June in his feelings but full of January in the obstinacy with which he stands by the laws of his own enactment and transgresses the statutes imposed upon him by God and nature, and therefore reveling in the testimonies of God's loving kindness but without ever having allowed that kindness so to permeate to his innermost, so to extend to the will-center of his being as to subdue that will into acquiescence with the perfect mind of God; in that way sorting over the features of the divine character, taking so much of God as he likes and ignoring the rest; eulogizing so much of the Bible as says: "For God so loved the world"; but grinding the same Bible under his heel when it says, "The soul that sinneth, it shall die."

The Warp and the Woof of Christianity

Now character is not to be produced by any such compromise; character is like gingham—it has to have a warp and a woof both, threads of sweet beauty crossed by threads of established righteousness. And even God's love has not done its work in the world till it has become such a permeating summer in the soul, till it has so reached the throne-room of the human will as to cause the deep undertones of the soul to blend harmoniously with the perfect music that sings itself forth in the thoughts and ordinances of God.

One mistake—and quite a serious one—that we sometimes make in reading our Bible is, that in turning over into its newer portions, we forget to carry with us still certain features of God's character that have come to their portraiture in the Bible's earlier parts. To use the phraseology of the photographer, we might say that in the two Testaments we have two pictures of God taken in rather distinct attitudes or poses. And it is important for us to notice that the first picture taken of him and shown to the world exhibits him in his kingliness, or what we might call his masterliness, his attitude toward us in the relation of moral authority, as one who imposes commands and requires them to be obeyed; as one who sets the key in which the music of humanity is to sing itself out and that key the note of righteousness, life that is holy, conduct and purpose that ring out in unison with God's own eternal impulse.

The Old Testament, far more distinctly and emphatically than the New, celebrates God in all those features of power, magnificence and colossal infinity, that fall in so naturally with his position in the universe as its original Author and sovereign Ruler.

And the New Testament, when it comes, does not settle off from that foundation, but while revealing God to us under another one of his aspects, paints even the more winning features of his character upon that old background of royalty, and lets that background come sufficiently into view to convince any sincere student of the portrait that the background is there in all its old and original seriousness, and in a way too to indicate that the gentler lines that are put upon the picture are not drawn simply for the purpose of eliciting the affectionate admiration of the beholder, but in order also to draw him in a sweet reconciling way to that deep settled basis of God's character lying in his purity and holiness.

Stability and Mastery

We must remember that even the Cross of Christ, with all its bewildering fulness of Divine affection, is not set up in the world merely to be reveled in as a luxury, but also to serve as a utility, as a mellowing atmosphere in whose gentle warmth the hearts of men may be touched into love, and not only touched into love but lovingly subdued into obedience, that so men may not only become sweet in their relations to one another, but sound, solid in all that interiorness that makes out a man's personal righteousness, profoundly knit into the moral framework of God and his universe.

Now I suggest to you whether, in this presentation of the matter, there has not been brought into view one of the defects of some, at least, of our current Christianity: whether there is not in that Christianity a certain lack of virility—very pretty, but not exactly robust—a Christianity that softens very agreeably the surface of life, that makes people carry themselves with somewhat more consideration toward each other, disposing people to be more mutually forgiving—all of which certainly is delightful and to be cordially and gratefully

THE KING AND THE BEGGAR

By Margaret E. Sangster, Jr.

He sat upon his golden throne
In all his robes of state, alone:
  And as he sat, he sighed.
And though he drank from silver cup,
And at his word a host rose up,
  His heart within him cried.
And though his face was bright and fair,
A specter touched his shining hair;
  And at the touch he died.

And yet he was a reigning king,
  With all that gold could buy;
And he was kind, and good, and young;
  O God, why did he die?

He sat upon the snowy ground,
And drew his ragged coat around,
  To fight the bitter cold.
His feet and hands were cracked and bare;
No hat was on his grizzled hair;
  That, even, had been sold.
He had no friend to press his hand;
He was a stranger in the land;
  And he was wan and old.

For he was just a beggar gray,
  And oft his heart would sigh;
And oft his lips would murmuringly
  Plead God to let him die.

O God! we question not thy will;
And yet the query, never still,
  Echoes from sea to sky;
And we shall always want to know
Why beggars live mid want and woe,
  While kings grow sick and die!

Christ Our Master

recognized, but at the same time a Christianity that has not penetrated to the spot where men keep their will, where they decide whether they will adopt God's law or manufacture a law of their own, and make personal convenience, natural desire and popular usage, rather than what is felt to be absolutely right in God's sight, the arbiter of conduct. Can we interpret a good deal of what we discover in current life in any other way than this—I mean in the current life of those who allow themselves to be reckoned as among Christ's followers? Can we put any other construction upon the fact that there is greater willingness to listen to the doctrine of Christ as a Lover than to listen to the doctrine of Christ as a Master? People object to rigidity, but moral rigidity is the very nucleus of character, that anchorage into grounds of eternal righteousness so tense that no strain at the cables will drive the ship upon the rocks—what I would call holy vertebracy.

And that comes by being mastered. Beautiful stability always means standing under the pressure of some splendid mastery. That is why the planets do not break from their orbits, rush out into measureless space and meaninglessly roam forever and ever in the eternal distances. They are held under the dominion of their superb sovereign, the sun. It takes two things to compose the complete beauty of this beautiful world of ours; it takes warm sunshine, what we might call the sun's love of the world, the sun's heart-throb, making its beat felt among all objects lying under the fervid sky, among all creatures moving through genial atmosphere; and it takes also the very strictest kind of submission—submission absolute and unvarying on the part of everything in nature, all the way from star to atom; submission absolute and unvarying, to the particular statute to which it is individually amenable. That is the finishing charm of the material world, sunny loyalty, sweet obedience.

"Ye call me Master; and ye say well, for so I am." Is our Christianity simply a surface tenderness of heart toward Christ as our Lover, or has his love so permeated our being that we have acquired the holy art of loving him with an affection that is not only tender but that is also worshipful and submissive? clinging to him as our Friend, but kneeling before him and obeying him as our Master?

THE LITTLE CHILDREN IN GOD'S PARK

BY REV. J. M. FARRAR, D.D.*

THIS beautiful world is God's Park. Adam, God's first man, was put in charge of the garden part of the park. "God took the man and put him into the Garden of Eden to dress it and to keep it." The garden was planted eastward in Eden, just the right place to get the morning sun and the cooling evening shadows. This garden park was very large. How do we know it was very large? Because a very great river flowed through it. The river was so large that as it flowed through the garden it divided into four rivers, named Pison, Gihon, Hiddekel and Euphrates. The Eden River must have been larger than our Hudson River, and I am sure the garden park was larger and more beautiful than the country through which the Hudson flows. Oh, oh—go slow! Why? How could one gardener and his assistant take care of such a large garden park? But you forget that there were neither thorns nor thistles and no seeds that grow weeds. As yet they did not have to work hard enough to sweat. They could float down the river and watch the flowers grow.

I AM so sorry Adam was never a little boy and Eve a little girl playing together in this wonderful park. No little child in God's park! Why did I call Eden one of God's public parks? I fear you did not read the beautiful park story carefully. It tells us that God walked in the garden "in the cool of the day." God just loved to come down from heaven and walk through this beautiful garden park. How proud Adam was, after a day's work well done, to know that God walked among the flowers and fruit! But once God came in the cool of the day and found nothing but shadows. No bright light spreading the tree shadows like lace carpet along the paths.

SOMETHING was wrong! When Adam and his companion heard the voice of God, they ran and hid themselves among the trees. Why did they hide? Wonder if you can find the answer in your own heart? You hear father coming home and then you run. Sometimes as you run your toes are toward father and other times your heels are all father sees among the trees. Why? You know, father knows, God knows. Adam had disobeyed, sinned against God, ruined the garden park. Out into a land where thorns and thistles grow they had to go. With the plow they earned their bread by the sweat of the brow.

To every boy and girl God says, "Plant a garden park where I can walk. Every time you pull up a weed and plant a seed you are helping to make God's world beautiful. As a little child in the garden park you are working for God. Who was it that said something like this? The one who makes two blades of grass grow where one grew before is a philanthropist. When Christ rose from the dead he found himself in a garden. A garden park for the living Christ is our work. A world beautiful for Christ's sake. A river in the first park garden. Where the river flows fruit grows. Certainly I will tell you a story. It is the story of a little child in God's park.

IN THE early fifties a party of emigrants on their way to the gold fields of California struck out on the desert for the land of promise. The trail was well defined by abandoned wagons and the bones of horses, mules and human beings. Struggling through the yielding sand, the thermometer at 120 degrees, wheels falling apart, animals dying from heat and thirst, they on the second night out halted some ten miles from "Cook's Well," with water in their kegs exhausted.

Tradition states that a little ten-year-old girl was heard praying in one of the wagons for water. It states that in her childlike faith she said: "O good heavenly Father, I know that I have been a very naughty, naughty girl, but oh dear, I am so very thirsty, and mamma, papa and the baby all want to drink so much. Do, good God, give us water, and I will never, never be naughty again."

The gaunt, half-starved, desperate men gathered around the wagons and listened to the humble petition. One voiced the rest and said, "May God grant it!" Soon the voice of the little child, in cheerful accents, sounded clear in the silent night:

"Oh, mother, mother, get me water; oh, I can hear it running; oh, do get some water for baby and me."

THEY thought her delirious from her sufferings, when suddenly a babel of sounds broke forth from the oxen and mules, all frantic and endeavoring to break loose from the wagon poles. A rustling noise called their attention to a slight depression near the wagons, and on investigating the cause they found water, clear and sparkling, gushing up out of the sand.

This spring continued to flow, running due north for twenty miles, then was lost in the sand. In places it was two miles wide and from four to twenty feet deep. Along this new river life arose, and there the desert blossomed like the rose. It changed the desert into God's park. Who shall say it was not an answer to the faith of a child?

Letters from Home

IT WAS Mother Alton who started it. The idea came to her one day along the first of the year when she found in her mail a letter from each of her four scattered children. She took grandmother into her confidence at once and each of them sat down and wrote the most newsy, homey letter she could to "My dear children."

This double missive was mailed to Clara, newly married and going through her first experience of living in a city. It came in the morning when Clara, after watching her young husband disappear in a crowd of down-town workers in the foggy street, was wondering how she could possibly get through another long, lonely day; and the brightness and enthusiasm of it was so catching that before she knew it she was singing about the flat in such a way that it was barely a happy chance that she heard the greetings of the aristocratic old lady next door, who for the first time seemed aware of her neighbor's existence, and nodded and smiled across her window plants.

About a week later a young doctor in a large town several States away gladly went back from the eminent position to which he had climbed and became again for a time little Billy Alton, playing about the street of an Eastern village and going fishing and swimming in a pebbly brook. Then, having so lost himself over the triple letter he had received, and which Clara had very aptly named "the Altonian," the doctor sat down, and in his own hand added a dozen closely filled pages to the already bulky missive and sent it on its way.

In due time this packet came to a not over-prosperous little western home where John, oldest of the Alton "children," and the least successful from a worldly standpoint, struggled to provide for a brood that nearly overflowed its nest. The contents of the legal-looking envelope was a tonic. John held his head higher and felt that his cordial attention to customers of the store where he clerked was of greater worth to the business. And, as if in keeping with this feeling, his employer that very evening called him aside to tell him that he had decided that he deserved a rise.

So when the Altonian again went on its journey, although it bore an added amount of postage it carried a message so buoyant that it might almost of itself have flown across land and sea to where Ensign Harold Alton, in one of Uncle Sam's ships, had stopped for nautical survey work on a lonesome Cuban coast. The budget came on the ensign's birthday, although only Harold himself of the whole ship's company knew of that anniversary, for the ensign was much too well acquainted with the sailor boy's love of pranks to disclose the possession of a birthday. But thoughts, under the broiling sun and around the not over-tempting mess-board, of the nipping air of New England and the huge spicecake and crusty chicken pie which always graced the home table on this day, almost brought tears to his eyes. It isn't everything at twenty-five to be a naval officer.

Then the letters came. Spicecake and chicken pie were as nothing beside that packet of home news and home love! Harold spent three solid hours over it that evening, and then sat up beginning his own contribution to its fatness until a glance at his watch startled him.

It would be quite useless to go on and tell of the return of the budget to Mother Alton and grandmother. Every one can imagine that. It is enough to add that the Altonian has never since its beginning been allowed to drop out of circulation, but has continued through long years and many changes to bind together a family that might without its messages of love and cheer have drifted widely apart.

THE WORLD'S BIGGEST SUNDAY SCHOOL

THE FIRST METHODIST SUNDAY SCHOOL OF BRAZIL, INDIANA

BETWEEN Indianapolis and Terre Haute is a town called Brazil. It is a town of 9,300 inhabitants. Now, if one were going to find a spot to locate the biggest Sunday school in the world, one would hardly be likely to settle upon that particular Indiana town, or any other town of similar or nearly similar size in any other State. It would seem that London, or New York, or Chicago, or San Francisco, or some other city of the first, second, or third magnitude, would be the place to attempt to create the biggest Sunday school in the world.

But again and again it has been demonstrated that it isn't the number of inhabitants in a town, nor is it its location, which will fix its importance and value to society. Put a big man in a small town and he will make the town big, if not in numbers, then in influence and power. So W. E. Carpenter, a man of big ideas, and, above all, of big faith, has made Brazil famous as the home of the largest Sunday school in the world. Yet if any one should try to give the credit of this remarkable achievement to Mr. Carpenter he would immediately insist that the credit belongs elsewhere.

One of the mottoes of the school is: "What kind of a school ye desire when ye pray, believe, and ye shall have it." Year by year a definite program is laid out for the school, usually coming to the superintendent's heart from the Holy Spirit. About twelve years ago, after the completion and dedication of the new church which made a fitting home for the mammoth Sunday school, the goal set for one year was "A thousand dollars for missions." Easter Sunday, the date set for reports and returns, found $1,115 on the altar "to carry the Gospel to the uttermost parts of the earth." The next year the program was: "A thousand dollars for missions; a thousand souls for Jesus." Faith for the giving was easy; it had been done the year before. But could one thousand souls be won for Christ in the twelve months? Let the superintendent tell the story: "Nothing is impossible when a band of workers are linked up in partnership with Christ. The officers and teachers went to prayer, the altars were enkindled, the teachers became burdened for their scholars, the scholars became interested, teachers began holding meetings with their classes. The fires began to burn, the baptism came, the revival was on, and finally one afternoon one teacher came to the superintendent and said: 'Brother Carpenter, I have been praying all night for my class of thirteen boys, and they are all here and want to decide for Christ to-day. Will you give us a chance?' Of course we would give them a chance; that is what we were looking for and expecting. The opportunity was given, the teacher came with her thirteen boys, and with them sixty-eight others, and within the next three weeks the number increased to more than three hundred. The revival fire was spreading. Calls came from the country; our workers, always ready, answered the call and a new Sunday school was organized, out of which grew a revival with forty-four conversions and accessions to the church. Another Sunday school was reorganized, out of which grew another revival with seventy-five conversions and accessions. And when the year had closed and the records were made, we found that more than a thousand souls had been touched by the power of Jesus Christ."

But the most amazing record was made during the year which closed on Easter Sunday, 1911. That year the mark had been set at 2,500 silver dollars for the benevolences of the church, including missions, and the doubling of the enrolment of every class and department. Mr. Carpenter promised to double every offering made up to $1,250, half of the sum to be raised.

As Easter drew near classes began to report that they had doubled their enrolment and had provided for their Easter offering. The honor roll was begun, announcing to the school Sunday by Sunday the classes that had reached their mark. The chorus of "A Great Day Coming" was varied to suit achievements and circumstances:

Oh, get ready! Oh, get ready!
Oh, get ready for the Easter Day.

Classes who could rose and sang:

We are ready, we are ready,
We are ready for the Easter Day.

"The greatest revival in the history of the church was now on; people were being attracted from every part of the city. The enrolment was being increased by leaps and bounds, and classes in numbers going on the Honor Roll, until three weeks before Easter every class in the school had met its apportionments, was placed on the Honor Roll, and still the school was growing." Bishop Hughes, Secretary Downey and other officials were present on the great occasion. Silver dollars to the number of 2,808 were laid upon the table inside the altar rail, and the enrolment of the school reached the mark of 4,897. One of the striking features of the campaign was the creation and growth of a men's Bible class, which by Easter time reached an enrolment of nearly six hundred. Rev. Ernest C. Wareing is the present pastor of the happy church of whose work this big Sunday school is but one department. A. H. H.

The Mothers' Cradle Roll Class

DAILY MEDITATION

A SCRIPTURAL THOUGHT FOR EACH DAY IN THE YEAR

BY REV. J. H. JOWETT, D.D.

WEDNESDAY, January 8. Psalm 8. "What is man that thou art mindful of him?" But this is not a disparagement of man. The emphasis of the sentence is surely not upon "man" but upon "is." "What is man?" What must he be that the great God calls at his door and enters to be his guest? What must God think about him to do him such high honors? "Thou hast made him a little lower than the angels!" What must he be? "Thou hast crowned him with glory and honor." What must be his standing before thee? Vast possibilities must surely stretch before him that the King pays him such signal regard. Can it possibly be that "man" is the King's son?

And so I think we are taught to think greatly of ourselves in order that we may live in a great way. Not with self-conceit, for that always belittles man: but with healthy self-respect, for that always ennobles him. We must think of ourselves so royally that we can never do anything mean. Self-reverence is, under God, a strong defense.

THURSDAY, January 9. Psalm 103: 13-22. "He knoweth our frame." The Bible abounds in such gracious and tender words. "He remembereth us in our low estate." "I have many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now." "He will not permit you to be tempted above that ye are able." The burden is suited to our counsel. The revelation is determined by our experience. The pace is regulated by our years. "He carrieth the lambs in his arms." He "leads on softly." Nothing is done in ignorance. "The Lord is mindful of his own. He remembereth his children."

And so must I practice the belief in God's compassionate nearness. In my childhood I used to sing: "There's a Friend for little children, above the bright blue sky." I know better now. He is nearer to me than I can dream. I used to sing: "There is a happy land, far, far away." Now I sing: "There is a happy land, not far away." The good Father and his home are not in some remote realm. They are very, very near to me: and he knows all about me. "He knoweth our frame."

FRIDAY, January 10. Acts 17: 22-31. "As though he needed anything." "He may not need us; but does he want us?" Such is the question I heard Dr. Parker ask as he preached upon these words. And he took up a handful of flowers which he had upon the pulpit and said: "These flowers were gathered for me by little hands in a Devonshire land! Did I need them? No. Did I want them? . . . Your little girl kissed you before you left for business this morning. Did you need it? . . . Did you want it?"

And so Almightiness may not need our weakness, but the loving Father wants his children. "We are his offspring." Our Father delights in the love of his children. The Saviour said to a Samaritan woman, "Give me to drink." And perhaps it is within the scope of our holy privilege to refresh the heart of our Lord. Perhaps we can give him to drink of the well of our affections, and he will see of "the travail of his soul and be satisfied."

POLLYANNA

BY ELEANOR H. PORTER

Author of "The Story of Marco," "Into Still Waters," "The Transformation of Margaret," etc.

A SERIAL STORY. ILLUSTRATED BY M. STOCKTON MULFORD

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

Pollyanna, eleven years old, comes East to live with her aunt, Miss Polly Harrington, of Beldingsville, Vt. Miss Harrington is a lady of most unlovely and ungenerous character, though she believes herself to be a very good woman, and tries vigorously to do in every case what she believes to be her duty. She has consented to receive Pollyanna at the request of the Ladies' Aid Society of the mission church in the West of which the child's father had been pastor. Her mother, Miss Polly's sister, had died some years earlier, her father but recently. The young wife had never received her family's forgiveness for marrying the poor minister. But now Miss Harrington consents to receive the little girl and directs her servant Nancy to prepare a small attic room for her. She wishes to put her at a distance from her own apartments and avoid the risk of her marring the valuable furnishings of any other room. Nancy is sent to the station to meet Pollyanna. From every fresh disappointment she rallies amazingly, always finding something to be glad about. She explains that this is a game which her father had taught her and played with her. Nancy agrees to try to play the game, too. Pollyanna takes jelly to Mrs. Snow, a fault-finding invalid, and wheedles her into having her hair dressed and her curtains raised. After a number of visits Mrs. Snow herself begins to play the game. Pollyanna also meets a mysterious silent Man, who is, she learns later, Mr. John Pendleton, a rich and rather sour recluse, and after a number of one-sided salutations makes him talk to her. Aunt Polly at last has Pollyanna moved to a larger and more beautiful room. After she has surprised her aunt into adopting a stray dog and cat, she finds a homeless boy, and brings him in, confident that Miss Polly will keep him. She is disappointed in this, however, her aunt resolutely resisting the strange influence the little girl has already begun to have upon her. Nothing daunted, Pollyanna takes the boy's case to the Ladies' Aid Society of the Beldingsville church, but here, too, meets with disappointment. Returning through the woods she finds Mr. John Pendleton, who has fallen and broken his leg. He sends Pollyanna to his house, a big, silent and terrifying edifice, to telephone for Dr. Chilton to come with men and a stretcher. Pollyanna performs her errand with amazing alacrity, returning to hold his head on her lap till the doctor comes. Pollyanna takes jelly also to Mr. Pendleton, and begins to sense mysteries. Both Dr. Chilton and Mr. Pendleton appear to have had a special interest in Miss Polly, the thought of which seems somewhat to irritate that lady. She is particularly vexed that the doctor caught a glimpse of her at the window of the sun parlor after Pollyanna had inveigled her into having her hair dressed gracefully and decorated with a red rose.

CHAPTER XIV

JUST LIKE A BOOK

JOHN PENDLETON greeted Pollyanna today with a smile.

"Well, Miss Pollyanna, I'm thinking you must be a very forgiving little person, else you wouldn't have come to see me again to-day."

"Why, Mr. Pendleton, I was real glad to come, and I'm sure I don't see why I shouldn't be, either."

"Oh, well, you know I was pretty cross with you, I'm afraid, both the other day when you so kindly brought me the jelly, and that time when you found me with the broken leg at first. By the way, too, I don't think I've ever even thanked you for that. Now I'm sure that even you would agree that you were very forgiving to come and see me, after such ungrateful treatment as that!"

Pollyanna stirred uneasily.

"But I was glad to find you—that is, I don't mean I was glad your leg was broken, of course," she corrected hurriedly.

John Pendleton smiled.

"I understand. Your tongue does get away with you once in a while; doesn't it, Miss Pollyanna? I do thank you, however; and I consider you a very brave little girl to do what you did that day. I thank you for the jelly, too," he added in a lighter voice.

"Did you like it?" asked Pollyanna with interest.

"Very much. I suppose—there isn't any more to-day that—that Aunt Polly didn't send, is there?" he asked with an odd smile.

His visitor looked distressed.

"N-no, sir." She hesitated, then went on with heightened color: "Please, Mr. Pendleton, I didn't mean to be rude the other day when I said Aunt Polly did not send the jelly."

There was no answer. John Pendleton was not smiling now. He was looking straight ahead of him with eyes that seemed to be gazing through and beyond the object before them. After a time he drew a long sigh and turned to Pollyanna. When he spoke his voice carried the old nervous fretfulness.

"Well, well, this will never do at all! I didn't send for you to see me moping this time. Listen! Out in the library, the big room where the telephone is, you know, you will find a carved box on the lower shelf on the big case with glass doors in the corner not far from the fireplace. That is, it'll be there if that confounded woman hasn't 'regulated' it to somewhere else! You may bring it to me. It is heavy, but not too heavy for you to carry, I think."

"Oh, I'm awfully strong," declared Pollyanna cheerfully as she sprang to her feet. In a minute she had returned with the box.

It was a wonderful half-hour that Pollyanna spent then. The box was full of treasures, curios that John Pendleton had picked up in years of travel, and concerning each there was some entertaining story, whether it were a set of exquisitely carved chessmen from China, or a little jade idol from India.

The visit, certainly, was a delightful one, but before it was over, Pollyanna was realizing that they were talking about something besides the wonderful things in the beautiful carved box. They talked of herself, of Nancy, of Aunt Polly, and of her daily life in Beldingsville. They talked, too, even of the life and home long ago in the far Western town. Not until it was nearly time for her to go did the man say, in a voice Pollyanna had never heard John Pendleton use before:

"Little girl, I want you to come to see me often; will you? I'm lonesome, and I need you. There's another reason—and I'm going to tell you that, too. I thought, at first, after I found out who you were the other day, that I didn't want you to come any more. You reminded me of—of something I have tried for long years to forget. So I said to myself that I never wanted to see you again; and every day, when the doctor asked if I wouldn't let him bring you to me, I said no.

"But after a time I found I was wanting to see you so much that—that the fact that I wasn't seeing you was making me remember all the more vividly the thing I was so wanting to forget. So now I want you to come. Will you, little girl?"

"Why, yes, Mr. Pendleton," breathed Pollyanna, her eyes luminous with sympathy for the sad-faced man lying back on the pillow before her. "I'd love to come!"

"Thank you," said John Pendleton gently.

After supper that evening, Pollyanna, sitting on the back porch, told Nancy all about Mr. John Pendleton's wonderful carved box, and the still more wonderful things it contained.

"And to think," sighed Nancy, "that he showed you all of them things, and told you about 'em like that, him that's so cross he never talks ter no one—no one!"

"Oh, but he isn't cross, Nancy, only outside," demurred Pollyanna, with quick loyalty. "I don't see why everybody thinks he's so bad, either. They wouldn't, if they knew him. But even Aunt Polly doesn't like him very well. She wouldn't send the jelly to him, you know, and she was so afraid he'd think she did send it!"

"Probably she didn't call him no duty," shrugged Nancy. "But what beats me is how he happened ter take ter you so, Miss Pollyanna—meanin' no offense ter you, of course—but he ain't the sort o' man what generally takes ter kids; he ain't, he ain't."

Pollyanna smiled happily.

"But he did, Nancy," she nodded, "only I reckon even he didn't want to—all the time. Why, only today he owned up that one time he just felt he never wanted to see me again, because I reminded him of something he wanted to forget. But afterwards—"

"What was it?" interrupted Nancy, excitedly.

"He didn't tell me. He just said it was something."

"The mystery!" breathed Nancy, in an awe-struck voice. "That's why he took to you in the first place. Oh, Miss Pollyanna! Why, that's just like a book. Now tell me everything—everything he said, Miss Pollyanna, there's a dear!" And Pollyanna told her.

When she had finished, Nancy drew a long sigh.

"I've got it—sure! Now listen. Mr. John Pendleton was Miss Polly Harrington's lover!" she announced impressively, but with a furtive glance over her shoulder.

"Why, Nancy, he couldn't be! She doesn't like him," objected Pollyanna.

Nancy gave her a scornful glance.

"Of course she don't! That's the quarrel!"

Pollyanna still looked incredulous, and with another long breath Nancy happily settled herself to tell the story.

"It's like this. Jest before you came, Mr. Tom told me Miss Polly had had a lover once. I didn't believe it. But Mr. Tom said she had and that he was livin' now right in this town. And now I know, of course. It's John Pendleton. Hain't he got a mystery in his life? Don't he shut himself up in that grand house alone, and never speak ter no one? Didn't he act queer when he found out you was Miss Polly's niece? And now hain't he owned up that you remind him of somethin' he wants ter forget? Jest as if anybody couldn't see 'twas Miss Polly!—an' her sayin' she wouldn't send him no jelly, too! Why, Miss Pollyanna, it's as plain as the nose on your face; it is, it is!"

"Oh-h!" breathed Pollyanna, in wide-eyed amazement. "But, Nancy, I should think if they loved each other they'd make up some time. I should think they'd be glad to make up!"

Nancy sniffed disdainfully.

"I guess maybe you don't know much about lovers, Miss Pollyanna. You hain't big enough yet, anyhow. But if there is a set o' folks in the world that wouldn't have much use for that 'ere 'glad game o' yourn, it'd be a pair o' quarrelin' lovers; and that's what they be. Ain't he cross as sticks, most generally?—and ain't she—"

Nancy stopped abruptly, remembering just in time to whom, and about whom, she was speaking. Suddenly, however, she chuckled.

"I ain't sayin', though, Miss Pollyanna, but what it would be a pretty slick piece o' business if you could get 'em ter playin' it—so they would be glad ter make up. I guess, though, there ain't much chance, much chance!"

Pollyanna said nothing, but when she went into the house a little later, her face was very thoughtful.

CHAPTER XV

PRISMS

AS THE warm August days passed, Pollyanna went very frequently to the great house on Pendleton Hill. She did not feel, however, that her visits were really a success. John Pendleton talked to her, it is true, and he showed her many strange and beautiful things. He seemed to like to hear Pollyanna talk, too, and Pollyanna talked. Pollyanna liked to talk; but she was never sure that she would not look up and find him lying back on his pillow with that white, hurt look that always pained her; and she was never sure which—if any—of her words had brought it there. As for telling him "the glad game," and trying to get him to play it—Pollyanna had never seen the time yet when she thought he would care to hear about it.

Pollyanna never doubted now that John Pendleton was her Aunt Polly's one-time lover; and with all the strength of her loving, loyal heart, she wished she could in some way bring happiness into their lives, which seemed to her to be so miserably lonely. Just how she was to do this, however, she could not see. She talked to Mr. Pendleton about her aunt—and he listened, sometimes politely, sometimes irritably, frequently with a quizzical smile on his usually stern lips. She talked to her aunt about Mr. Pendleton—or rather, she tried to talk to her about him. As a general thing, however, Miss Polly would not listen—long. She always found something else to talk about. She frequently did that, however, when Pollyanna was talking of others—of Dr. Chilton, for instance. Aunt Polly, indeed, seemed particularly bitter against Dr. Chilton, as Pollyanna found out one day when a hard cold shut her up in the house.

"If you are not better by night, I shall send for the doctor," Aunt Polly said.

"Will you? Then I'm going to be worse," gurgled Pollyanna. "I'd love to have Dr. Chilton come to see me!"

She wondered, then, at the look that came to her aunt's face.

"It will not be Dr. Chilton, Pollyanna," said Miss Polly sternly. "Dr. Chilton is not our family physician. I shall send for Dr. Warren—if you are worse."

Pollyanna did not grow worse, however, and Dr. Warren was not sent for.

It was toward the end of August that Pollyanna, making an early morning call on John Pendleton, found a flaming band of blue and gold and green edged with red and violet lying across his pillow. She stopped short in awed delight.

"Why, Mr. Pendleton, it's a baby rainbow—a real rainbow come in to pay you a visit!" she exclaimed, clapping her hands together softly. "But how did it get in?"

The man laughed a little grimly. John Pendleton was particularly out of sorts with the world this morning.

"Well, I suppose it 'got in' through the beveled edge of that glass thermometer in the window," he said wearily. "The sun shouldn't strike it at all—but it does in the morning."

"Oh, but it's so pretty, Mr. Pendleton! And does just the sun do that? My! if it was mine I'd have it hang in the sun all day long!"

The Conquest of the Underworld

THERE seems to be strong reason for hope that the present vigorous efforts being made to purge the nation's metropolis of its ugly alliance of vice with municipal authority will be more successful and permanent than similar upheavals and reforms in the past. It is impossible to observe the transactions of the recent months without recognizing that the district attorney, Charles S. Whitman, and his first assistant, Frank Moss, have gone at the situation with amazing skill, knowledge and force, and with utter fearlessness. The city was almost startled by the rapidity with which Becker was convicted and sentenced; similar prompt action in the case of the gunmen added another item to the conquest of the underworld; and now the district attorney's office, in connection with the Curran Aldermanic Committee, is hard on the trail of the unspeakable "system," which grows rich from the shame of womanhood.

It is an issue upon which all the forces standing for civic righteousness should unite, and the time is now. The community has been bewildered by the revelation of the completeness with which the forces of the underworld are united. The forces of righteousness must unite with the same thoroughness and vigor. There is coming to be a new kind of conscience about the social evil. Good people are realizing that the sad sisterhood of vice is made up of women with souls and brains, with hearts and hopes and sorrows like those of other humans. The way to save them is to care that they are lost, to recognize that they are indeed sisters and daughters to whom society and the church and all movements for social welfare owe a debt of sympathy and salvation. It is bad enough that in New York City alone thirty-five thousand women live this kind of a life; but that the officials of the city should make their shame a business upon which they themselves grow rich is altogether intolerable.

The church has an especially definite task to perform in the matter. And from lending practical and positive aid in cleaning up the municipal halls, it should cry out with new earnestness against the horrors of sin. Its ministers should probe down into the mysteries of the wickedness of the human heart and sound a thrilling warning for the souls that are entangled in the labyrinth of crime. The love of money, the love of self-indulgence, unconcern for the interests and the fate of others—these are the things that are spoiling American life, especially in its great cities. Some men high in social and commercial life, sometimes, it must be acknowledged with abject shame, high in the circles of church life, are really in league with vice. They leave the details of the management of their property to others and try to make themselves believe that God does not know that they know what goes on in the properties they own and from which they reap gain. Our cities need again to hear prophetic voices proclaiming the wrath of the Almighty against sin.

The nation and the nation-wide church will watch eagerly the final outcome of New York's battle with the underworld. If a definite victory is won every city throughout the union will feel the thrill of hope and something of determination to make righteousness triumphant.

Peace Amid Strife

THE ninety-eighth anniversary of continuous peace between the United States and the British Empire was celebrated a few days ago in a unique manner. Public men in both countries and also in Canada took occasion in messages through the leading journals to express their appreciation of this long-lasting peace. They were united in favor of a celebration of the rounding of the peace century two years hence on a scale commensurate with its importance to both countries. Secretary of State Knox wrote that the long, unbroken friendship had been a benefit to both nations, and that neighborly intercourse and trade had developed and grown to colossal proportions. Attorney General Wickersham wrote that peace has now become a habit and a condition "which it is unthinkable should ever be altered." While it is surely a fine thing to have the Anglo-Saxon world at peace, it is, after all, only a section of the whole globe. If, for the next two years, that influence could be successfully employed in promoting peace in those lands where war is now raging, it would greatly add to the glory of the occasion. It is hard to reconcile the belief that the world has grown tired of war, with conditions in Europe to-day, where militarism is everywhere dominant, where almost every country is a huge armed camp, and where one war has followed another with startling rapidity, notwithstanding the pledges of arbitration given at The Hague. Austria is finding to its cost what a war panic means, its ruined trade and its multitudes of unemployed showing the effect upon the country's industries of a "state of war," even without striking a blow. While monarchs and ministers may plan campaigns of conquest, the love of peace has taken deep root in the hearts of the common people, and the sense of the folly and wickedness of war as a means of settling international disputes has been steadily growing. However, the lamentable fact remains that our "civilization" is still a long way off from that blessed time when the weapons of war are to be transformed into implements of husbandry. The change may come after some overwhelming upheaval, which will uproot militarism and convince the world that peace and prosperity go hand in hand, and that the very worst use to which human beings can be put is to train them for slaughter in battle.

The Parcel Post at Work

THE Parcel Post system went into operation on January 1, the Post Office Department having first shipped to 60,000 postmasters and 45,000 rural carriers the necessary printed supplies and equipment. These include 70,000 scales, 110,000 rubber stamps, 10,000,000 insurance tags, 153,292,455 Parcel Post stamps, and 12,058,435 postage due stamps. Putting the whole gigantic system into general operation in one day was a tremendous undertaking. It will require some time for the postmasters, clerks and carriers to familiarize themselves with the regulations, but it is confidently expected that the new system will work smoothly from the beginning. Zone maps and guides are supplied by the department to business firms, manufacturers and others intending to ship goods by the new method. The rates have already appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of December 4, 1912.

An Unwise Prophet

ACCORDING to a statement which recently appeared in the New York Times, one of the cardinal "princes" of the Roman Catholic Church has ventured to predict that that church will in the future be the church of the American people. He did not claim that it would be so to the exclusion of all other creeds; but, in his opinion, it is destined to be the dominant religion in this republic.

Now, if this attempt to gauge the future of a nation of one hundred million souls were made by any other than one of the leaders of the Roman hierarchy, it might well be set down as a mere empty boast, in line with similar vaunts that have lately been made by irresponsible persons; but coming from so high a personage, it is entitled to serious consideration. It is doubtless intended to encourage the rank and file in the great campaign "to make America Catholic." It is a safe and logical proposition that "the future can best be judged by the past," and if we apply this rule in the present case, we are confronted by some very remarkable facts. It is not so long ago since all Europe was Catholic. What is the situation to-day? As Dr. Mangasarian has pointed out, more than half of the ancient Catholic territory has been lost to the Roman Church. Here is the roll call:

Lost by Rome
Germany	Portugal
Holland	Italy
England	Still Held by Rome
Scotland	Austria
Switzerland	Spain
Sweden	Ireland (partially)
Norway	Mexico
Denmark	South American States
France	Central American States

If we seek the cause of this phenomenal decline of a once great religious cult, it is easy to find. The Church of Rome has ever been the foe of popular education and the ally of oppressive monarchies. Wherever its power has prevailed, illiteracy has flourished. It has been the practical expositor of the doctrine that the people of any nation are unfit for self-government. What was the condition of the Philippines after three centuries of Rome rule? And what of Central and South America? Portugal, though nominally Catholic, repudiated the authority of the church when it stepped into the ranks of the progressive nations. Spain is almost ready to follow its example and to make a complete cleavage between church and state. And so it has been with the whole long line of European countries that won back the liberties of which Rome had despoiled them. In no single case was the question one of spiritual doctrine; they simply compelled Rome to relax its grasp on the welfare of the nation, to cease forever from troubling its politics and interfering with its highest material interests.

With these historical examples before us, there would seem to be little to justify the confident prediction of the cardinal "prince" that the Roman Church will ultimately be the church of the American people. Hopes of the rehabilitation here of Rome's lost splendor are a fool's dream. Three years ago Bishop McFaul of Trenton, N. J., reckoned that the Roman Church has lost 25,000,000 American adherents in a single generation, and should have had 40,000,000 instead of 15,000,000. She may count as loyal followers those multitudes who have left the Rome-ridden countries of Europe to seek political and religious liberty and better general conditions here It is certain their experience has not inspired them all with a desire to come again under the domination of a power that seeks absolute control of their liberty, their conscience and their political allegiance. Europe long ago learned that "Rome" is not a religion, but, as Lecky the historian says, "a vast and highly organized kingdom, recognizing no geographical frontiers, governed by a foreign sovereign, pervading temporal politics with its manifold influence," and this fact has been forced upon our own nation by recent events, for the whole attitude of the hierarchy, cardinal "princes" and prelates together, in the crusade to "make America Catholic" has been repugnant to the patriotism, the intelligence and the sound common sense of our people. It will probably not be long before some representative of Rome here will attempt to disavow the absurd pretensions set up by cardinals and papal organs, and such action is likely to be accelerated by the influence of Roman Catholic laymen, who in this matter seem to have more sense than their ecclesiastical superiors.

Miss Helen Gould's Engagement

THE engagement of Miss Helen Gould, known and loved by the nation, to Mr. Finley J. Shepard, of St. Louis, has been announced. Mr. Shepard is assistant to B. F. Brush, president of the Missouri Pacific and other railroads in which Miss Gould is interested. He is a bachelor of forty-five, and Miss Gould is forty-four. At the death of her father, Jay Gould, in 1892, Miss Gould came into a fortune of $10,000,000, which increased to $30,000,000. It was on the tours of inspection of her railroad and other properties that she and Mr. Shepard formed the acquaintance which led to their engagement. Miss Gould's national reputation has grown out of her incessant and free-handed benevolence. Her charities were probably on a larger scale than those of any other American woman up to the time of the Sage Foundation. Some of her larger benefactions have been a Navy Y. M. C. A. building costing $500,000; the New York University, $310,000; to the United States Government for the prosecution of the Spanish-American War, $100,000; the Hall of Fame, New York University, $100,000; scholarships at New York University, $40,000; an engineering department to the New York University; Navy Y. M. C. A. at Norfolk, $25,000; Rutgers College, $25,000; and Woman's Relief Association, $25,000. Besides these there are to be recorded hundreds and even thousands of benevolences reaching out into every department of suffering among the poor, the disabled, the little children and the aged, and to help worthy struggling young men and women to an education and usefulness. The whole nation, through Congress, honored her in ordering a gold medal to be awarded her. The States of New York, Pennsylvania, and Illinois thanked her in resolutions. More than three thousand soldiers and sailors wrote her personal letters of thanks for favors shown, and these she has now in an album which she counts one of her most precious treasures. From the veterans of the Civil War she received an official badge of honor. The firemen of New York gave her a solid gold medal in gratitude for the help she rendered them. The fact that Miss Gould inherited a fortune would entitle her to no especial credit. The thing that has made her by all odds the most popular woman of America is her recognition of the ministry of wealth, of the fact that her fortune was given to her by the Divine Hand for the benefit of men and the honor of God. There is a law of human benevolence by which we become the property of the people we befriend and serve, and by which those to whom we give and for whom we toil become a part of our possessions. Mr. Shepard paid a visit to Miss Gould at her home in New York, and attended divine worship with her Sunday, December 22. Miss Gould has shown her good sense in selecting as her husband a healthy, intelligent, industrious, virtuous, and pious American, who has worked his way up from the poverty and honor of a parsonage into a career of success and usefulness. So many daughters of the rich look for a husband among the titles and names of the Old World, with much gilt and pomp and little manhood, and have had a long time to regret their folly. Miss Gould is a devout follower of Christ, and every penny and moment she has given has been out of intimate personal love for her Lord. Few philanthropists of any time or nation have ever been impelled to service more completely by the spiritual instinct. Of her it can be said what the Master said of another woman who manifested the intensity of her love for him:

Wheresoever this Gospel shall be preached in the whole world, there shall also this, that this woman hath done, be told for a memorial of her. (Matt. 26: 13.)

Crippled Boy Befriended

A BOY had both of his legs taken off in an accident on a northern railroad controlled by Mr. J. J. Hill. The boy wrote the magnate of his condition, disclaiming any responsibility but his own for his injury, and asking if he could not give him some employment in his railroad system out of which he could make a living. Mr. Hill ordered artificial limbs for the lad, and invited him to spend Christmas with him in his own home. He was told that arrangements had been made for his liberal education, and a promise was given of a place in the railroad office for the rest of his life. Christ counts all such services as rendered to him personally.

Verily I say unto you, Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me. (Matt. 25: 40.)

India's Viceroy Seriously Wounded

AT THE close of the exercise observed in the transfer of the imperial capital to Delhi, India, there was a tragedy. As the line of royally decorated elephants bearing the princes and rulers of the realm passed down a long narrow street in Delhi, a native anarchist, standing on the roof of one of the low houses, which placed him about on the same level and within a few feet of the immense elephant on which the viceroy and his wife rode, threw a bomb, which struck the howdah in which they were seated, instantly killing the attendant, who was holding a large parasol over them, and seriously wounding Lord Hardinge, the viceroy, and the driver in front. The procession was halted for a few moments. The Baron undertook to rise, but was white and faint and bleeding, and in great haste they took him down from the elephant and to the hospital. Another officer of rank immediately took his place, and the procession went out to the Durbar camp, where the celebration closed with fitting exercises. The throwing of the bomb by the crazy anarchist is not necessarily an indication of national unrest, for such crimes are committed often in a country as free as our own. There is no denying the fact, however, that there is some discontent on the part of some of the natives of India under British rule. The people of India have seen Japan make rapid strides in self-government, and have witnessed its marvelous victory as an independent nation over so great a country as Russia, and have wondered why they should be a dependent empire. They do not realize that their immense populations are not homogeneous like the Japanese, that many of them lack the stamina of the Jap, and that their always clashing religious creeds make it a certainty that they will have to move to an ideal autonomy by a much slower process. None regret the bomb-throwing more than the real reformers among the natives, who are asking for a larger liberty in an orderly manner. Despite this tragedy the relations between the English Government and the Indian natives has never been more cordial or hopeful. England does well by her colonies; she inspires in them the most fervent loyalty; she gives them the best civilization and a glorious Christianity. The good ruler having the welfare and happiness of the people in view should not be the target of assassination, but respected and upheld by the friends of law and order. The apostle Paul considers that such are appointed by the Divine Ruler to administer his authority.

For rulers are not a terror to good works, but to the evil. For he is the minister of God to thee for good. (Rom. 13: 3, 4.)

A Billion Dollar Cotton Crop

THE record-breaking cotton crop of this country was 15,692,701 bales, exclusive of "linters." For the past five years the average crop has been 11,847,270. Government experts estimate the yield for 1912 at 13,820,000, exclusive of "linters," which will give more than 14,000,000. As each bale is supposed to weigh 500 pounds, the American crop will be nearly seven billion pounds when linters are reckoned. At 12½ cents a pound the staple will bring between $850,000,000 and $875,000,000. Cotton seed, once thrown away as useless, is now valuable for its oil, the seed cake fed to cows and sheep, and used for fertilizer. This seed is worth $135,000,000 a year, so the total value of the crop will reach $1,000,000,000. Egypt and India raise some cotton, but the United States produces more than the whole world combined. Europe and Asia will have to come to the South for their cotton. Corn is still king. Its over three billion bushels will yield more money than the cotton, but after corn comes cotton, a close second for the primacy of the harvest. Cotton will keep our balance of trade on the right side; it will be the magnet that will draw the gold from other countries to our shores. The new South deserves the prosperity it enjoys this year. In our bountiful harvests we are enjoying the blessings to the fields promised by the prophet to Israel of old:

Be glad then, ye children of Zion, and rejoice in the Lord your God: for he hath given you the former rain moderately, and the latter rain in the first month. And the floors shall be full of wheat, and the fats shall overflow with wine and oil. (Joel 2: 23, 24.)

Risked Life for Doll

MAYBELLA FRANCESCA, aged six years, was standing at a bonfire near her home in Brooklyn when a mischievous boy snatched the doll she was carrying on her arm and threw it into the flames. Without hesitating the little girl leaped into the fire and groped blindly for the lost doll. The children standing by screamed for help. Samuel Calapana, who was passing at the time, pulled the girl out of the fire. She was burned so badly that the surgeons at the hospital gave very little hope for her life. In the midst of her excruciating suffering she kept calling the name of her doll, Carlotta, and asking if it had been taken out of the fire. The little boy did not mean any such harm; he only thought he was smart; but there is often a streak of the savage in the urchin of the street in his rudeness and injustice to his playmates, male and female. The maternal instinct was beautifully illustrated in the love of the girl for her doll, and the heroic instinct of motherhood manifested in the sacrifice of the dear little one in rescuing it. If the girl of six could take such risk to save a material thing that seemed human to her, how much more should we manifest genuine self-sacrifice for the rescue of men, women and children from the flames of moral evil! The prophet asks:

Is not this a brand plucked out of the fire? (Zech. 3: 2.)

BEGINNING OF SIN AND REDEMPTION

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

THERE was a poisonous growth in the Garden of Eden that did not spring from God's planting. It grew in the heart-gardens of Adam and Eve because Satan planted it there. We call it by the name of "sin," and its fruit was "disobedience." People do not always have a clear idea about the origin of sin. For example, in a backwoods Sunday school down in Florida, about thirty scholars were present, among them were both children and grown people. They had been called together from their cabins by the ringing of a large hand-bell. After the school had been opened with song and prayer, the teacher said: "Now I will hear your verses." The first to respond was a woman who said: "The Lord giveth and taketh away the sin of the world." "Where did you learn that verse?" the teacher asked. The woman recognized that she was challenged, and she replied quite stiffly: "Out of my Bible!" "No," said the teacher, "the Bible does not say that; but it tells us that Satan gave sin and God takes it away." But all the rest of the session the woman sat in sullen mood. She might have been convinced against her will, and so was of the same opinion still. What we do learn in the Bible is that Satan planted sin in the heart of the first woman, and then made her his accomplice to plant sin in the heart of the first man. We also read: "Your adversary, the devil, as a roaring lion, walketh about, seeking whom he may devour" (I. Peter 5: 8). And from the incident of the fall of Adam and Eve, we must know that he began his perambulations very early, even with Creation. It will be quite useless for us to discuss how the devil came into being, only we may know that he was the leader of the fallen angels. "How art thou fallen from heaven, O Lucifer, son of the morning! . . . Thou saidst in thy heart, I will ascend into heaven. . . . I will make myself like the Most High" (Isa. 14: 12-14). "God spared not angels when they sinned, but cast them down to hell" (II. Peter 2: 4). Having tried his wiles upon angels, Satan next essayed to make victims of men, and strangely enough he used the same argument with men as with angels: "that they should become as wise as God himself" (Gen. 3: 5). We are told the very spot in the garden where Satan planted his vile seed—it was beside a beautiful tree, on which hung luscious fruit—nowhere in the Bible are we told what kind of a fruit-tree it was. We hear it spoken of as the "apple," but there is no warrant for it—the kind of fruit has nothing at all to do with it—only that it was "forbidden fruit," forbidden simply as a test of the obedience of the human creatures to the God who had made them. There might have been other trees in the garden bearing the same kind of fruit, but they were told only that they must not eat of the fruit of the tree in the midst of the garden. (Gen. 3: 3.) When Satan came and urged them to eat of the fruit of the tree, he could not say: "Ye have need of it," for on all sides there was plenty of fruit and grain for food, and God had given it all to Adam and Eve, so Satan had need to appeal to something beside hunger in Adam and Eve. They were not hungry. He directed the attention of Eve to the beauty of the fruit, and its suitability for food. Thus her appetite was tempted. The second temptation set forth by Satan was to Eve's ambition: "Ye shall be as gods!" The third temptation was spoken to break down her trust in God, for said he, "Ye shall not surely die when ye have eaten it," as God has said; and then the woman took of the fruit of the tree and ate it, and she gave some to Adam, and he ate of it. So was sin given to the world by Satan.

PARADISE LOST

After a painting by Abbey Alston

And he placed at the east of the Garden of Eden cherubim, and a flaming sword which turned every way, to keep the way of the tree of life.—Gen. 3: 24

Have we wondered how a woman could have held parley with a serpent? for in that form Satan appeared in the Garden of Eden. The serpent form was not then disgraced, and there may even have been something grand in its appearance. Satan afterward entered into swine. Why should he not have entered into a splendid serpent to deceive the first woman, and to accomplish through her the fall of man?

The Evil Charm

It is certain that Satan could have influenced Adam and Eve solely through mental suggestion. Serpents of to-day have a faculty of "charming" not only people, but birds and animals. A traveler in the woods saw a pigeon on the bough of a tree motionless, and just in front was a snake with gleaming eyes fastened upon it. The traveler killed the snake, and the bird almost lifeless crept in among the leaves, but where it could still be seen by the traveler, who watched it for some time until it began to recover consciousness. Do we wonder at Satan's audacity in trying to corrupt man, whom God had made only a little lower than himself? Let us not forget that Satan tried to tempt God himself in the person of the Lord Jesus. "He was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin" (Heb. 4: 15.)

"Well, doctor, why was evil introduced into the world?" asked a young student in Princeton College of Dr. McCosh. The doctor replied in his broad Scotch way, holding up both hands: "You have asked the hardest question in all philosophy. Socrates tried to answer it, and failed; Plato tried it, and he failed; Kant attempted it, and made bad work of it! Leibnitz tried it, and he begged the whole question as I've been telling you. I confess" (gnawing at his thumb knuckle), "I confess I don't know what to make of it myself."

Temptation — Why?

We dare to say that God permitted temptation because otherwise the devil would have greater power than God. Read Job 1: 6-12, and see how God permitted Satan to try Job: "And Jehovah said unto Satan: Behold, all that he hath is in thy power, only upon himself put not forth thy hand" (to slay him). (Job 1: 12.) Then followed the afflictions of Job; his flocks and herds were stolen or killed; his servants were killed; his children were killed by a great wind—tornado; his home was destroyed by the same wind; a dire sickness came upon his body; friends proved false; even his wife said: "Renounce God and die." But Job stood the test, and in the end Jehovah gave Job twice as much as he had before (Job 42: 10). "Evil then is not a mystery, but a means selected to make the most of me," a philosopher has said.

> The fountain of joy is fed by tears,
> And love is lit by the bread of sighs;
> The deepest griefs and the wildest fears
> Have holiest ministries.
> —From the Song of Faith.

And what shall we say of Satan himself?

> It is Lucifer,
> The son of mystery,
> And since God suffers him to be,
> He, too, is God's minister,
> And labors for some good
> By us not understood.
> LONGFELLOW.

Let us believe then that the tree of knowledge of good and evil was placed in the Garden of Eden to train to virtue by resisting evil. Without it man

OUR SUNDAY SCHOOL SUPERINTENDENTS' ROUND TABLE

—ONE SUPERINTENDENT asks: "How can I improve the quality of my teachers?" We reply: "This can be done in three ways: First, have a teachers' meeting where not only the portion of Scripture to be taught is carefully explained, but suggestions about teaching it to the different grades of scholars are also given. It would be well for the pastor to explain the lesson since he is the authoritative leader in the teaching of the Bible. If possible secure an expert teacher to give the teaching hints; such a person may sometimes be secured from a training school connected with the public schools. Second, Establish a teachers' library, and then see that it is used. The following is a list of good books to put in such a library: For teachers of younger scholars—Practical Primary Plans, Black; A Study of Child Nature, Harrison; Love and Law in Child Training, Todd; Head Work in the Sunday School, Littlefield; The Point of Contact in Teaching, Dalton; Our Boys and Girls, Kennedy; The Unfolding Life, Lamoreaux; The Teacher that Teaches, Wells; Stories and Story Telling, St. John. For teachers of older scholars—Ways of Working, Schnuffler; The Intermediate Worker, Lewis; The Girl in Her Teens, Slattery; After the Primary—What? McKinney; Boy Life and Self-Government, Flake. We would be glad to receive names of other books that have been found helpful by teachers. Third, Let superintendents ask the teachers to make quarterly reports in writing of the following: Number of scholars enrolled. Average attendance. Number of visits made by teachers in homes of scholars. General conduct of scholars in the class. Number of conversions."

FROM Live Wires we quote the following: "Things the superintendent should know: You should know that the scholars in your school have learned some definite truths or facts from the Bible this year. If they have not done so, it is not their fault. You should know exactly how many members there are in your school, and who have been absent four Sundays in succession, and the reason for so long an absence. You should know how your average attendance this month compares with the same month last year. You should know what others are doing, and wherein others succeed while you fail, and why. You should know what your teachers are teaching. This is of very great importance. You should know your lesson, your teachers, your scholars, yourself and your God. You should know what you are aiming at. Too many have no ideal in their work."

—"WILL YOU please tell how many schools and colleges could be built and equipped at the cost of one big battleship?"—Mrs. M. W. C., Wilmington, N. C. The battleship Dakota cost $12,000,000; add to this $28,000,000 for twenty years' upkeep; then the junk-heap. Twenty-eight million dollars would build 1,400 churches at $20,000 each to last one hundred years, more or less, and as far as influence goes forever. It would provide education for 14,000 men or women for four years at $500 a year. The Lucretia Mott School in Washington cost $96,182. The cost of a battleship would build one hundred and twenty-four such buildings. The McKinley Manual Training School in Washington cost $292,154. The cost of a single battleship would build forty-one such training schools. The Congressional Library in Washington, the finest library building in the world, was built for but little over half the cost of a battleship, and is maintained for three-fourths the cost of keeping a battleship afloat. The most complete Sunday school building in the world was erected in Washington at a cost of $100,000. How many such buildings could be erected in other cities at the cost of a single battleship?

[CHRISTIAN HERALD readers are beginning to send suggestions for this Round Table. More are invited, especially from superintendents who have seen good results accomplished in their own schools or others. Send them to Wilbur F. Crafts, 206 Pennsylvania Avenue, S. E., Washington, D. C.]

SATURDAY, January 11. Isaiah 43: 1-7. That is surely a superlative honor. "I have created him for my glory." I stood before one of Turner's paintings, and a man of fine judgment said to me, "That is Turner's glory!" He meant that in that picture the genius, and the power, and the grace of Turner were most abundantly expressed. And it is the will of God that man should express his glory, and by his righteousness and goodness witness to the great Creator's power and love. Amid all the wonders and sublimities of earth, and sky, and sea, man is to be the Almighty's "glory."

The contrast is pathetic when we turn from the Creator's purpose to our immediate life. There is so much that is shameful, crooked and perverse. There is little or nothing of "glory." But, blessed be God! the purpose abides, and the Creator's work goes on! In his redemptive grace he has made provision for marred work, for spoilt and perverted life. "The crooked shall be made straight." "I will bring again that which is out of the way." "Where sin abounds grace doth much more abound."

SUNDAY, January 12. I. Thessalonians 4: 13-18. Death is not an end; it is only a new beginning. Death is not the master of the house: he is only the porter at the King's lodge, appointed to open the gate and let in the King's guests into the realm of eternal day. "And so shall we ever be with the Lord."

And thus the range of three score years and ten is not the limit of our life. Our life is not a land-locked lake enclosed within the shore-lines of seventy years. It is an arm of the sea, and where the shore-lines seem to meet in old age they open out into the infinite. And so we must build for those larger waters. We must lay our life-plans on the scale of the infinite: not as though we were only pilgrims of time, but as children of eternity! We are immortal! How, then, shall we live to-day in prospect of the eternal morrow?

MONDAY, January 13. Genesis 3: 1-12. Liberty without limits would be a deadly license. Liberty without conditions would deprive life of its discipline and therefore of its growth. In all holy life there must be a forbidden tree. "Ye shall not eat of every tree." But all limitations ordained of God are appointed to be the ministers of our strength. If we observe them they do not belittle us; they exalt us. "Thy statutes have become my songs." "The statutes of the Lord are right, rejoicing the heart."

The devil would make us believe that the restriction of our freedom enslaves us, and that the bursting of our barriers is the enlargement of our life. "In the day ye eat thereof ye shall be as gods!" It is a fatal delusion. A broken moral law always means a broken and shriveled life. "The wages of sin is death," and the wages begin to be paid at once. Every time we sin death is at work. The finest powers of the soul become more and more benumbed. We die downwards, beginning with those exquisite feelings and perceptions which held delighted communion with God.

TUESDAY, January 14. Genesis 3: 17-24. "Cursed is the ground for thy sake." And yet I think that in the very curse began the restorative means of God's grace. Adam was compelled to grapple with "thorns and thistles," and in the very severity we may see the tokens of God's goodness. If Adam had been driven out of Eden into idleness, into a world that demanded no effort, no sweat of body or of mind, then in his very indulgence he would have sunk into laxity and moral hopelessness. But God's first gift of grace was the gift of hard work. God "cursed the ground" and thereby blessed the man.

And so let us thank God for his gift of labor. "The earth helped the woman," says the book of Revelation. And earth is ever intended by our God to be our helpmeet to heaven. While we are digging for her treasures we may find other treasures of priceless kind. While we work we are worked upon, and thus our common labor may help us to recover the lost likeness of our God.

These Daily Meditations will appear in each issue throughout 1913.

would probably have remained innocent, but later he learned the higher meaning of virtue.

Here is an illustration from Nature about the seductiveness of sin. A man lying upon the grass noticed a little plant of sundew; presently a tiny fly alighted upon it, and tasted one of the tempting glands which grow upon the sundew. Suddenly three crimson-tipped fingerlike hairs bent over and touched its wings with a sticky touch which held it fast. The fly struggled in vain to get free, but the more it struggled, the more hopelessly it became besmeared. It still, however, protruded its tongue, feasting as it was, being more and more firmly held by other hairs or tentacles, as they are called. When the captive was entirely at the mercy of the plant, the edges of the leaf folded inwards, and looked like a closed fist. Two hours later, the fly was an empty sucked skin, and the leaf was opening for another unwary visitor.

Adam and Eve tried to hide their sin from God, who from the beginning knows the hearts of all men. But God did not abandon them; he did not give them over to the devil. He met them face to face and provided a way for them out of the pit into which they had fallen. They were still his children, but they were his rebellious children. First, God gave Adam and Eve an understanding of Satan by pronouncing judgment upon him, and ever since the fall in Eden, men have had a wholesome fear of the devil, just as God intended.

We open the Red Letter Bible to Gen. 3: 15, and there we see the first red star which "marks a prophetic reference to Christ as the coming Messiah," for in the words of that verse, Christ as a Redeemer from sin was promised to Adam and Eve. They were bidden to look forward to him as their Saviour, as we are bidden to look back to his death on Calvary. Truly he was slain from the foundation of the world (Rev. 13: 8).

But earth was no longer to be a blissful Eden to Adam and Eve; they needed to go out into the world and be made strong to do the right by overcoming difficulties, and so God closed the door of Eden by setting an angel guard against it, and a warning, even a flaming sword, was set up to guard the entrance and prevent their return.

Start the Year Right

You know, of course, what conservative investment stands for—how essential it is to progress—to the upbuilding of confidence—to the continuance of prosperity—all factors of the utmost importance to every man, woman and child. It is but natural, therefore, that you should resolve to begin the New Year by becoming an investment bond owner—by passing investment bonds around, if your financial resources permit, among the members of your family. Then, with the cashing of each of the semi-annual interest coupons, direct evidence would be had of the wisdom of always investing your money conservatively, thus providing not only for your own future but for the welfare and comfort of those dependent upon you.

We shall be pleased to submit to you diversified offerings of sound investment bonds to yield a return averaging from 5 to 5½ per cent., and suggest that you send for

This department is maintained for the benefit of our regular readers; the service is offered entirely free of cost to them, and all correspondence is strictly personal and confidential, in so far as the identity of the inquirer is concerned. Always enclose letter postage and write name and address plainly, addressing your inquiry to Financial Editor, CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York City.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD does not in any way guarantee investment advertisements. It is impossible to do so, because our subscribers have far more money to invest than our total capital would permit us to refund. ANSWERS TO FINANCIAL QUERIES

Mrs. H. W., Montana.

I do not recommend investment in the concern you have under consideration and mention in your letter.

D. S. B., New York.

I have never recommended the stock of the company mentioned in your letter, but inasmuch as you have already made an investment in this company, my advice will be of little use to you, and about the only thing left for you to do is to hold your stock and accept the dividends every three months as long as the company is willing to make these payments.

J. M. L., Utah.

I do not consider the profit-sharing bonds you mention as a "safe investment," and do not recommend them. The market is so liberally supplied with sound investment securities that return from 4 per cent. to 6 per cent. that no CHRISTIAN HERALD reader need risk money in such real estate schemes, which are at best decidedly speculative, however honest the promoters may be.

Miss S. P. J., Michigan.

The company mentioned in your letter has been engaged in a banking and investment business for a good many years and I have never heard the slightest adverse criticism of their methods of doing business, their financial responsibility, or their willingness to carry out all contracts with their customers; and, of course, this includes the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD who have become clients of the concern during the years in which their advertising has appeared in our magazine.

C. M. C., West Virginia.

While I have no definite knowledge of the particular lots at $62 each that have been offered to you by the realty company of 200 Fifth Avenue, I am very positive in my advice against this kind of speculation, especially when you live so far from the locality in which the lots are supposed to be. Put your money into a good security. Why not investigate the $100 bonds listed on the New York Stock Exchange, which may be bought at prices which yield a return of from 4 to 5 per cent.?

P. B. F., Pennsylvania.

A. L. Wisner and John J. Myers, who comprised the firm of A. L. Wisner & Co., are on trial before Judge Mack in the Federal District Court of New York City, charged with misuse of the mails to further a scheme to defraud. The stocks are probably worth nothing, and the former customers of the firm have lost all their money. I hope that in the future you will confine your investment operations to real securities. This department always stands ready to offer constructive criticism and advice in regard to investment matters, and I trust that you will command its service whenever you are so inclined.

J. D., Ohio.

I can offer no definite solution for the problem before you. It is my advice, though, to first apply to a local bank for the money you need to repay the $10,000 mortgage on your property. As a usual thing, banks do not charge an excessive commission for furnishing money on first mortgage loans. Quite often they do not charge any commission at all, but of course I do not know the custom in Akron. It would be extremely difficult, I believe, for you to secure the money you desire to borrow outside of your immediate vicinity, and if you were successful, you would probably be put to a considerable expense. I wish I might be of more assistance to you in this matter.

E. M. B., New York.

You state that you have held U. S. Steel common for a number of years, and cannot understand why it should continue to drop when the trade conditions are so good. The entire stock market has undergone a recession of from 10 to 20 points in the last six months, and it is not at all strange that Steel common should go down with the rest of the stocks. The price of Steel common in no way reflects the condition of the company's general prosperity, which was never better. I think you have no need to worry. The statement of unfilled orders for the Steel Corporation at the end of November amounts to 7,852,882 tons—the largest on record in the history of the Steel Corporation. I think, however, it might be well for you to take your money out of Steel common and invest it in a sound, preferred industrial stock. The three railroad stocks you have on your list are regarded as good investment security, but I would not invest in American Can common.

G. S. B., Connecticut.

In your letter you do not state the price you paid for National Enameling and Stamping common. I do not regard this stock in any sense an investment. It has not paid a dividend since 1905, and I see no immediate prospects of one. The company earned an equivalent of but a little over 1 per cent. on the common during 1911, and I do not believe that much more can be accredited to the common stock for the present year. I do not look for tariff revision that would be likely to affect this company seriously, although, of course, that is purely problematical. If you can sell your stock without too much loss, I advise you to do so and invest the proceeds in a non-speculative, dividend-paying security.

Rev. C. S., Illinois.

(1) The affairs of the Industrial Savings & Loan Company are now in the hands of Mr. Benjamin D. Haight, special deputy superintendent of the New York State Banking Department, Times Building, New York City, who tells me that his department assumed trusteeship of the company January 1, taking it over from the Windsor Trust Company, and that his department will then proceed as quickly as possible to effect a complete liquidation of the assets. I am told also at the office that it will probably be a year before all the assets are turned into cash and final dividend payments made to the creditors. Of course, there will be some loss, how much, Mr. Haight cannot tell at present. Your interests are being safeguarded by the State authorities. (2) I do not regard the Autopress Company shares as "sound investment." Leave them alone. (3) The Combination Orchard Company of Boston is engaged in a co-operative land scheme in either southern Georgia or northern Florida. I see nothing especially attractive in these co-operative agricultural schemes, and I would not advise our correspondents to go into them.

J. E. W., New York.

You state that you have a Wabash First Refunding 4 per cent. bond which cost 78, and a Missouri First Refunding Convertible 5 per cent. bond which cost 94¾. You ask if you shall hold for higher prices. One of the most unpleasant tasks for this department is to advise a correspondent to "take a loss"; but I am going to suggest just such a course with the first-mentioned bond. It is a highly speculative issue which has undergone many ups and downs. Since the Wabash went into the receiver's hands on December 18, 1911, when the refunding bonds, of which about $42,000,000 are outstanding, dropped to 55½, these bonds had advanced from 62 to 70. Last June they sold at 72½. The latest quotation I have is 64½. It may take a number of years before a reorganization of the railroad can be made effective, and in the meantime these bonds furnish excellent opportunities for speculators to put them up or down as they are inclined. (2) I do not advise you to sell your Missouri Pacific First Refunding Convertible 5 per cent. bond, which cost you 94¾. This bond in the last month sold at 88, and while no one is wise enough to accurately predict future prices for it at this time, the earnings of the road, being at present extremely satisfactory, should reflect on the prices of the securities of the road, including the bonds. In this connection I will state that, for the first four months of the new fiscal year Missouri Pacific showed a net income of $5,925,920 against $3,787,133 in the same time of 1911—an increase of $2,138,787. (3) New York Air Brake 6 per cent. bonds may be considered as a good speculative investment. There are $3,000,000 of these bonds outstanding, and up to July 1, 1913, they are convertible into stock of the company at par—a privilege, of course, not to be considered favorably at the present prices of the stock, which is now selling considerably under par.

A Sound Reason Why You Should Buy Bonds

Educational and charitable institutions having endowment funds to invest make it a practice to invest largely in well-seasoned bonds.

This fact, reflecting as it does the judgment of representative men acting in an especially responsible capacity, suggests to the individual investor a reason for buying bonds to assure safety of principal and ample income.

We are offering a variety of choice bonds for sound investment. We shall be glad to have you write, telling us in what particular class of bonds you are interested. Ask for circular No. H.

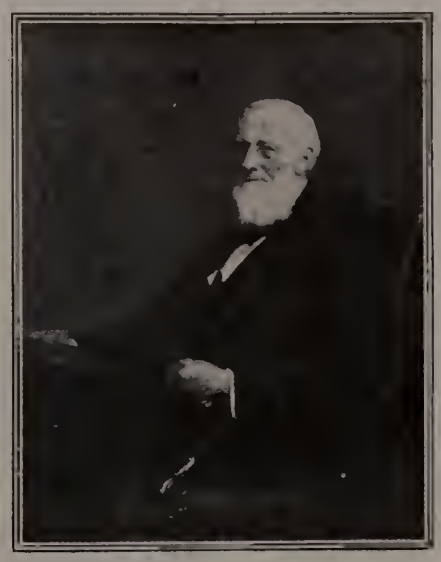
SIR ISAAC PITMAN CENTENARY

ON LAST Saturday, January 4, was celebrated the centenary of Sir Isaac Pitman, inventor of phonography, the best-known and most perfect system of shorthand writing. Stenographers the world over assembled to do homage to the memory of the man for the great work he accomplished and the boon he conferred upon the world of business and letters by his winged art. Many others, too, joined in the celebration to pay tribute to the worth of the distinguished schoolmaster, for Pitman is known and honored in all lands where the English language is spoken. His system is recognized everywhere as one of the most facile and adaptable as well as the most popular.



Sir Isaac Pitman

From the Memorial Portrait by A. S. Cope, A.R.A.

Like many more who conferred lasting benefits on the race, Sir Isaac Pitman came up from very humble surroundings. He was born at Trowbridge, a small village in Wiltshire, England, the son of Samuel Pitman, an operator in a cloth factory. The boy was one of a family of ten brothers and sisters. He received but an elementary education at the village grammar school, leaving off at thirteen to go into the factory where his father was employed. At the age of eighteen he made up his mind to become a teacher, and with this end in view entered upon a course of study at the British and Foreign School Society's College, London. In the course of a year or so he was qualified to take charge of a school at Barton-on-Humber, Lincolnshire. He remained four years in this place and then established a successful school at Wotton-under-Edge. A book of Taylor's shorthand had come to his hand and he set himself to improve it, but was told he had better invent a system of his own. He took the hint and after much thought and labor he succeeded in arranging the alphabet phonetically and later developed the plan of pairing the light and heavy consonants. On the 15th of November, 1837, was issued the first book of his now celebrated system under the title of Stenographic Sound-Hand. This was but a little twelve-page pamphlet, yet it contained the elements of shorthand as Pitman evolved them, and constituted the nucleus of the great system of sound-writing which to-day bears his name.

In 1887 the jubilee of phonography was celebrated by the students of Pitman in all lands, and the illustrious inventor was the recipient of many honors and testimonials. In 1894, in recognition of his great services, Queen Victoria bestowed upon Mr. Pitman the honor of knighthood. Three years later, on January 22, 1897, Sir Isaac passed peacefully away, full of years and honors, sincerely mourned by the nation on which his genius shed an unfading luster.

In 1844 phonography was first introduced into the United States. At present it is used by hundreds of thousands in public and official capacities.

THE VOICE OF THE NATION ON ROME

The Bible the One Great Charter of American Liberty and Independence

I AM glad to avail myself of the opportunity to thank you for the great service you are doing the citizens of this country in opening the columns of your widely read journal to the discussion of the question of the purpose and animus of the Roman Catholic Church, the Papacy, toward the United States. The writer of this letter is only an everyday citizen, but he is a native-born American of at least the third generation. To the minds of such persons certain propositions are evident: that all human governments rest upon two foundations, or, at most, three; first, might, the power of the strongest, however obtained and however retained; second, the necessary combination of the weaker to protect themselves against the despotism of the stronger elements and against the evils of anarchy; and third, the government that is built on the foundation of the Bible, the Word of God, declared to be so, and proved to be so in the experience of every candid inquirer, whether of a low or high degree of intelligence.

Monarchies and despotisms seem to have an element of durability in the concentration and retention of the governing power in the hands of a definite and hereditary class that democratic republics do not possess. And however it may be with systems of despotic form, it seems evident that the only hope of lasting durability to the government of a free republic is in the knowledge of and adherence to the laws of the Bible, and especially of the rules of the New Testament. The English colonists in America were, with very few exceptions, believers in an open Bible, and a great many of them had suffered much because they so believed. The men who adopted the Constitution of this country so believed. And now, for the preservation of that Constitution, the Bible should be placed alongside of it and above it. And when a stranger aspires to share in the ruling and privileges and unlimited treasures of this broad land, he should be required to show that he is familiar with the English language; that he has read and understands both the Bible and the Constitution, and to swear to support and uphold both before being allowed to become a voter. The reading of the Bible does not make a "State church" at all, but it does make first-rate citizens.

If the facts regarding the Papal Church and its history are as represented, and I believe they are, including its claim to control the faith and conscience and destiny of all men—then it seems evident that a devout adherent of that church cannot be a truly loyal subject of any other government on earth. The Bible is the one great anchor of the liberties and independence of our country, and its citizens of every name, race, or complexion. And we need to hold on to it in these latter days with even a stronger faith and grip than did our ancestors of Pilgrim days. No church, sect, or belief has a right to call itself Christian that takes away from its members the Word of God and bids them accept the dictum of any human being in its stead. SUBSCRIBER.

E. C. P., West Somerville, Mass. Please explain Rev. 21: 13, 14.

The gates, twelve in number, stand for the twelve tribes (according to the usual interpretations) and are inscribed, as architects usually have their names inscribed on their works, with the names of the twelve apostles. Paul, too, was an apostle; but the mystical number is retained, twelve representing the church. There are many varying interpretations of Revelation, but in the present case there seems to be a unanimous opinion concerning this passage, as the Vulgate, Syriac and Coptic manuscripts all agree in inserting "twelve."

S. B., Xenia, Ohio. What is the origin of "dago" as applied to Italians?

"Dago" is a corruption of the Spanish name Diego (Jaek or James), and was primarily a sailor's term for any one of Spanish, Portuguese, or Italian deseent.

M. L. S., Binghamton, N. Y. Suppose a person who was ignorant of astronomy and the method of taking observations should set out to find the North Pole, how would he know when he reached it?

By setting up a vertieal rod and measuring its shadows at frequent intervals as the sun passed around the sky. If these shadows all remained of the same length during the sun's course through the heavens, the "ignorant" explorer would then know he was at the pole. If the lengths of the rod's shadows varied during the twenty-four hours, he could not be at the pole, and the direetion in which the shadows fell shortest would indieate the way in which the boreal point lay. Of eourse, such observations could only be made during the "arctic day," that is, when the sun is above the horizon in the northern latitudes.

J. N. A., Buekeye, W. Va. 1. Pleasc explain Josh. 11: 9. 2. How large was Pompeii?

1. "Houghing" the horses is eutting the sinews of their hind legs, so that they are rendered useless. This was evidently done in order that the Israelites should not trust in military resources and to diseourage them from traveling beyond the borders of their newly acquired territory. 2. Pompeii had an estimated population of 20,000. Its dimensions cannot be positively stated, beeause it has not all been exeavated; but its walls are believed to have been about two miles in eireumferenee.

S. P., Torrington, Conn. Do all nations reekon time and longitude from the meridian passing through Greenwieh, England?

Heretofore they have not done so, England and the United States being the only leading countries reekoning from Greenwich. Germany adopted the meridian of Berlin, Franee that of Paris, and so on. However, in 1911 a eongress of the makers of nautieal almanaes of the different nations was held in Paris at whieh it was deeided that the plaees of sun, moon and planets will in future be published in terms of Greenwich time by all the prominent national ephemerides. It is probable that this action will have the effect of causing all chart, map and atlas makers to also adopt the Greenwich meridian.

A. C. C., Johnetta, Pa. Where can referenee be found to prove that only married men were entitled to a vote in the Jewish Sanhedrin?

Aeeording to the Mishna (a part of the Talmud) no candidate could be eleeted to the Sanhedrin unless he was the father of children. This was for the reason that only married eandidates could sympathize with domestic affairs. This implies that candidates must be married and men of family.

Earnest Reader, Strang, Neb. Your figure of speech that "death is only a veil" and "transparent to those on the other side," is a beautiful thought to me. A near and dear one has lately crossed over. What grounds have we for such a belief?

There are many things beyond our earthly experienee which can only be expressed by the language of imagery. In two distinct passages (I. Cor. 13: 12 and II. Cor. 3: 18) Paul employs a figure of speeeh to convey the idea that our mortality is an obstacle to spiritual vision—a veil. Death is the shedding of the garment of mortal flesh. As the believer nears the close of life, his hold on material things becomes feebler and his spiritual perception grows clearer. The soul is preparing to loosen its material environment; it is ripening for release—the putting off of the tabernacle of this flesh (II. Peter 1: 13; II. Cor. 5: 1). As the end of the journey comes into view, the spiritual vision is enabled to perceive and understand many things it could not do before. With regard to the knowledge of those on the "other side" of what is going on here, we have Scriptural evidence in support of it. Heb. 12: 1 tells us that we are encompassed with "a cloud of witnesses." All heaven is looking on and watching our struggles here, although our own eyes are still holden. There are other texts in Scripture which go to show that those who have

THE BEST TEACHER

Old Experience Still Holds the Palm.

For real practical reliability and something to swear by, experience—plain old experience—is able to carry a big load yet without getting swaybacked.

A So. Dak. woman found some things about food from Old Experience a good, reliable teacher.

She writes:

"I think I have used almost every breakfast food manufactured, but none equal Grape-Nuts in my estimation.

"I was greatly bothered with weak stomach and indigestion, with formation of gas after eating, and tried many remedies for it but did not find relief.

"Then I decided I must diet and see if I could overcome the difficulty that way. My choice of food was Grape-Nuts because the doctor told me I could not digest starchy food.

Grape-Nuts food has been a great benefit to me for I feel like a different person since I begun to eat it. It is wonderful to me how strong my nerves have become. I advise everyone to try it, for experience is the best teacher.

"If you have any stomach trouble—can't digest your food, use Grape-Nuts food for breakfast at least, and you won't be able to praise it enough when you see how different you feel." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

"Lots of good you'd get out of the thermometer, then," laughed the man. "How do you suppose you could tell how hot it was, or how cold it was, if the thermometer hung in the sun all day?"

"I shouldn't care," breathed Pollyanna. "Just as if anybody'd care—when they were living all the time in a rainbow!"

The man laughed. He was watching Pollyanna's rapt face a little curiously. Suddenly a new thought seemed to come to him. He touched the bell at his side.

"Nora," he said, when the elderly maid appeared at the door, "bring me one of the big brass candlesticks from the mantel in the front drawing-room."

"Yes, sir," murmured the woman, looking slightly dazed. In a minute she had returned. A musical tinkling entered the room with her as she advanced wonderingly toward the bed. It came from the prism pendants encircling the old-fashioned candelabra in her hand.

"Thank you. You may set it here on the stand," directed the man. "Now get a string and fasten it to the sash-curtain fixtures of that window there. Take down the sash-curtain, and let the string reach straight across the window from side to side.

"That will be all. Thank you," he said, when she had carried out his directions. As she left the room he turned smiling eyes toward the wondering Pollyanna.

"Bring me the candlestick now, please, Pollyanna."

With both hands she brought it; and in a moment he was slipping on the pendants one by one, until they lay, a round dozen of them, side by side on the bed.

"Now, my dear, suppose you take them and hook them to that little string Nora fixed across the window. If you really want to live in a rainbow I don't see but we'll have to have a rainbow for you to live in!"

Pollyanna had not hung up three of the pendants in the sunlit window before she saw a little of what was going to happen. She was so excited then she could scarcely control her shaking fingers enough to hang up the rest. But at last her task was finished, and she stepped back with a low cry of delight. It had become a fairyland—that sumptuous, but dreary bedroom. Everywhere were bits of dancing red and green, violet and orange, gold and blue.

"Oh, oh, oh, how lovely!" exulted Pollyanna; then she laughed suddenly. "I just reckon the sun himself is trying to play the game now, don't you?"

Mr. Pendleton frowned.

"What do you mean?"

Pollyanna stared slightly; then she drew a long breath.

"Oh, I forgot. You don't know about the game. I remember now."

"Suppose you tell me, then."

And this time Pollyanna told him. She told him the whole thing from the very first—from the crutches that should have been a doll.

"And that's all," she sighed, when she had finished. "And now you know why I said the sun was trying to play it—the game."

For a moment there was silence. Then a low voice from the bed said unsteadily:

"Perhaps; but I'm thinking that the very finest prism of them all is yourself, Pollyanna."

"Oh, but I don't show beautiful red and green and purple when the sun shines through me, Mr. Pendleton! The sun doesn't make anything but freckles—out of me," she added mournfully. "Aunt Polly says it does make them!"

The man laughed a little; and Pollyanna looked at him wonderingly; the laugh had sounded almost like a sob.

The Holy Ghost is the Third Person in the Trinity and equal with the Father and Son in power and glory. He is the divine helper, assistant, counselor and instructor, and his office is to carry forward the great work of teaching and saving men which Christ began. He is to the disciples of Christ what Christ himself was to them while on earth (see John 15: 26; I. Cor. 12: 4-11). He is the divine Spirit commissioned to guide, inspire and energize believers for doing the work of God on earth, interceding, directing, bearing witness and giving "gifts" (special spiritual qualifications). It is by the power of the Holy Ghost working through consecrated men and women that souls are won and the Gospel is made effective.

B. P., Bloomington, Ill. Please explain horse-power, and tell how the horse-power of a steam engine is determined.

Horse-power is a unit of the rate of work equal to 33,000 pounds lifted one foot high in one minute. For example, if a man weighing 165 pounds climbs a ladder 20 feet high, he does 165x20, i. e., 3,300, foot-pounds of work; and if he does it in a minute he is working at the rate of 3,300 divided by 33,000, or one-tenth, H.P. If he does it in 20 seconds, one-third of a minute, the H.P. he exerts is 3x3,300 divided by 33,000, or three-tenths, H.P. By a similar analogy the indicated H.P. of a steam-engine is found by measuring the mean effective pressure per square inch of piston throughout the stroke by means of the indicator diagram, and multiplying it by the area of piston to get the total force. The product of this quantity into the length of stroke gives the work done, and this, if multiplied by the number of strokes per minute, and divided by 33,000, gives the H.P.

Mrs. M. R., Bryant, Ind. 1. Luke 23: 24 is the fitting conclusion to the passage that precedes it. Jesus was drawing a comparison between those who set their hearts here and now on perishable things, and his followers, who would suffer persecution and privation. Their consolation was in his assurance that their reward in heaven would be great, and that the joy and abundance of the future life would more than compensate for their suffering here. 2. Matt. 5: 20 is also a passage from the Sermon on the Mount. The righteousness of the Pharisees was outward and formal; that of His followers must be inward, vital, spiritual. He spoke here not of individual Pharisees, but of the character of the system they represented and taught.

There are hundreds of thousands of them in our country to whom a pension of $100 a year would make it possible for them to live and educate their children in the public schools. One year's pension for an ex-President would give food and raiment to 250 poor widows."

Book Surpasses His Expectations

I received the Pictorial Life of Christ last Monday, and I thank you very much for same. You certainly did not say too much about this book in advertising it in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, for it surpasses even what I expected.

Reiterating my best thanks, I sincerely hope that the coming year will be a happy one, as well as a successful one, for the management of my beloved paper, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

"This one is genuine Pantasote—always fresh and clean.

"Look at the other one—how seedy and shabby it looks—you can tell quick as a wink that it isn't genuine Pantasote.

"A Pantasote Top is so easy to keep clean that there is no excuse for its ever looking shabby.

"A little soap and water when you are washing your car will keep your Top freshened up.

"Even when it gets stained with road oil, you can clean it off without any trouble."

Pantasote is the standard curtain material used in every Pullman Car. The Pullman Company chose Pantasote because it looks well and it wears like flexible steel.

That's the kind of material you should have on your top.

The most severe service conditions are discounted when Pantasote is being manufactured. It is the only Top material that looks well and wears well—the one that is rainproof, sunproof, sleetproof, coldproof, windproof, snow proof, heatproof, crackproof, and pretty nearly foolproof.

Send today for your copy of "The X-Ray on Automobile Tops." Describes fully all the different Top materials, it explains how they are made and just how they differ. After you have read "The X-Ray" you will know just what you are buying when you buy Pantasote. Send for that copy today. It's free to you.

BETTER PRAYER MEETINGS*

The Christian Endeavor and Baptist Young People's Union Subjects

IT WOULD be impossible to find a more important question than that which forms the topic for the Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. devotional meetings for January 19: "How Can We Better Our Prayer Meetings?" But, strange as it may seem, the question is as easy as it is important.

What is a prayer meeting? Surely that is an easy question. It is a meeting where people gather to pray. And the real root reason why prayer-meetings, either of church or young people's societies, are not more interesting and successful is that there is so little praying done.

The way to have a prayer meeting is to pray. The way to have a better prayer meeting is to pray more earnestly, more sincerely, more definitely, more believingly.

Is there a still deeper reason why the modern prayer-meeting is not more effective? Is it not probably true that the reason we do not pray more triumphantly is that we do not seriously and definitely care about the things for which we are expected to pray? You remember that time when mother was so desperately ill, or that day when there came a dreadful disappointment, crushing your heart all to pieces? You prayed then. Why? Because you cared. Things were happening that hurt, and you cried out to be relieved of the pain. It ought to hurt us more that people are living in sin; that men and women and little children are hungry and cold and broken-hearted; that many, many young people are lost in the paths of wrong. If we cared we would pray. Shall we not ask the Saviour to make us care and then to teach us to pray?

This meeting is in charge of the Prayer-meeting Committee. The chairman of that committee should get his members together for a special hour of prayer some time before the meeting, either on Sunday afternoon or the evening of some week day. That preliminary service should be a time of consecration. The members of the committee should talk over the needs of the society, should study the Scripture passage assigned, should try to begin to realize something of the tremendous, the limitless power of prayer which has been put into their hands, and then, consecrating themselves afresh to the Master's cause and with real faith, pray for the meeting to be held later, expecting that the Holy Spirit will be present to help all who gather.

The second verse of our Scripture reference is startling but positive. "If two of you shall agree on earth as touching anything that they shall ask, it shall be done for them of my Father which is in heaven." Emphasize both in the committee meeting and the larger service that it is not numbers that make a successful prayer meeting, but earnestness, definiteness and unity. Look up the story of the "haystack meeting" and tell it to the rest. The last verse is amazingly comforting: "Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them."

If the young people will recognize that Christ is really present when they meet; if they will talk to him frankly and simply and with childlike trust; if they will tell one another modestly and truthfully about their experiences in trying to serve him; if they will sing worshipfully and heartily, they will have better prayer meetings. And the whole church and town will notice the difference and be helped.

* TOPIC FOR CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR AND B. Y. P. U. Lesson for January 19, 1913. "How Can We Better Our Prayer Meetings?" Matt. 18: 18-20. (Led by the Prayer Meeting Committee.)

HOW CAN WE HELP?*

The Epworth League Lesson

THE three references given for the study of the Epworth League Lesson on January 19 form an unusually beautiful and practical chain of Scripture passages. The subject for the week's study is "The Social Goal: 'On Earth as it is in Heaven.'" It is inspiring to think what this world would really be like if God's will were actually done here as it is done in heaven. The problem of evil is a most baffling one, but we know that a lot of things that are done on earth are not at all in accordance with the will of God. We see all sorts of injustices and cruelties, privation that could be relieved, suffering that is needless, and wrong that should and could be stopped. Christ is getting together under his leadership a group of people who love the will of God and who are willing to try to work that will out at the cost, if need be, of suffering and sacrifice. Matt. 6: 10 is a part of the Lord's Prayer, and the words it contains have been uttered thousands upon thousands of times by every one who reads these words: "Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven."

Sometimes we get bewildered by the bigness of the task at hand; the wrong seems so very deep and so very widespread and our own resources of time, money and strength so very limited. There are so many people to be helped that sometimes we get discouraged and think it is hardly worth while trying to help those whom we might reach. But it is worth while. The kingdom comes that way. When your own will is yielded completely to Christ, when you can persuade another to yield his will to the will of God, when you can relieve even to some slight degree the sorrow and want of another, you have brought the kingdom nearer.

The second reference, Matt. 20: 25-27, gives another detail of the difference between the kingdom of heaven and the kingdom of earth. In the world outside a man may seek to be great by trying to get others to serve him. According to the plan of Jesus they are the greatest who can do most for others, and the highest rank to be won in the heavenly kingdom is that of the most useful and faithful servant to all the rest. Even those sociologists who make their observations and deductions without giving the Bible the place in their thought which we give it in ours are coming to recognize that the only sane social plan is one in which each one helps the rest.

Gal. 6: 2 brings the matter down to a still more practical and definite basis and gives us the real motive which should actuate us in our daily endeavors. "Bear ye one another's burdens, and so fulfil the law of Christ." Could there possibly be a finer call to a finer service? How heavy are the burdens men are bearing, burdens of sin, of want, of grief, of loneliness, of shame! Women and even little children are being crushed under life's hard tasks and strange perplexities and bitter trials. Jesus asks us to go out and help these burden-bearers, to lift part of their load and to help him get his cheer into their souls. And we are to do all this because we love him and in order that we may fulfil his law.

If the thousands of the young men and women of the Epworth League would make a positive and final determination to surrender their wills absolutely to the will of God, would pray not only with lip but with heart that his will might be done in the world, would take the thought of service as the keynote of their lives and the pathway to the highest nobility, and then would go about every day practically and lovingly trying to help bear the burdens of others the world would take long and rapid strides toward "The Social Goal."

* EPWORTH LEAGUE TOPIC for January 19, 1913. "The Social Goal: 'On Earth as it is in Heaven.'" Matt. 6; 10; 20: 25-27; Gal. 6: 2.

The Howard Watch

THE best of attention and service for the man who carries a HOWARD Watch—not on account of the watch, but because he is likely to be that kind of a man.

The possession of a HOWARD undoubtedly does suggest a man who appreciates quality and is quite able to know whether he is getting it or not; a man who respects HOWARD history; and withal, the practical man of orderly mind who expects to have things done on time.

A HOWARD Watch is always worth what you pay for it.

The price of each watch is fixed at the factory and a printed ticket attached—from the 17-jewel (double roller) in a Crescent extra or Boss Extra gold-filled case at $40 to the 23-jewel at $150—and the EDWARD HOWARD model at $350.

Not every jeweler can sell you a HOWARD WATCH. Find the HOWARD jeweler in your town and talk to him. He is a good man to know.

Admiral Sigsbee has written a little book, "The Log of the HOWARD Watch," giving the record of his own HOWARD in the U.S. Navy. You'll enjoy it. Drop us a post card, Dept. W, and we'll send you a copy.

CHRISTIAN MARTYRS GIVEN TO THE LIONS

CHRISTIANITY is the greatest fact in history. The early Christians endured martyrdom rather than forsake Principle. The picture shown herewith, from Ridpath's History, depicts 87,000 people assembled in the Coliseum at Rome to witness the Christians given to the lions. In such a scene may be read the inevitable doom of the Empire that ruled the world. The blood of the martyrs is the seed from which Christian civilization sprang. If you would know the history of mankind—every sacrifice for principle, every struggle for liberty, every conflict and every achievement, from the dawn of civilization down to the present time—then embrace this splendid opportunity to place in your home the world-famed publication,

DR. Ridpath gives the history of every religion of mankind, and shows the slow but sure progress that has been made from Paganism to Christianity, from darkness to light. The customs and habits of people, the development of their science and literature and art, the growth of religion and education form a very vital part of this history, and that which gives the work its lasting popularity is the wonderfully beautiful and fascinating style in which it is written. To read this work is not only to increase one's fund of knowledge, but to improve the literary style in which we write or speak, and to expand and develop the mental powers.

EVERY American citizen should know the history of his own country and of the world to intelligently perform his full duty as a citizen in the government of this Nation. How else are we to judge of the great national questions that crowd upon us for decision except by some knowledge of the past? For the answer read the history of mighty Babylon, or of imperial Rome as a kingdom, then as a republic, and finally as an empire, and familiarize yourself with her growth, development and decay. Then, when you know the cause of the rise and downfall of empires and nations, you will be able to intelligently discuss and decide the great questions that are pressing everywhere for attention.

RIDPATH takes you back to the dawn of history, long before the pyramids of Egypt were built; down through the romantic troubled times of Chaldea's grandeur and Assyria's magnificence; of Babylonia's wealth and luxury; of Grecian and Roman splendor; of Mohammedan culture and refinement; of French elegance and British power; of American patriotism and religious freedom, to the dawn of yesterday. He covers every race, every nation, every time, and holds you spellbound by his wonderful eloquence. Nothing more interesting, absorbing and inspiring was ever written.

RIDPATH throws the mantle of personality over the old heroes of history. Alexander is there—patriot, warrior, statesman, diplomat, crowning the glory of Grecian history. Xerxes, from his mountain platform, sees Themistocles, with three hundred and fifty Greek ships, smash his Persian fleet of over a thousand sail, and help to mould the language in which this paragraph is written. Rome perches Nero upon the greatest throne on earth, and so sets up a poor madman's name to stand for countless centuries as the synonym for savage cruelty; Napoleon fights Waterloo again under your very eyes, and reels before the iron fact that at last the end of his gilded dream has come. Bismarck is there—gruff, overbearing, a giant purist in the diplomatic ring, laughing with grim disdain at France, which says "You shall not." Washington is there, "four-square to all the winds," grave, thoughtful, proof against the wiles of British strategy and the poisoned darts of false friends; clear seeing over the heads of his fellow-countrymen, and on into another century—the most colossal world figure of his time!

Questions and Answers

F. M., Mays Landing, N. J. Please state the three best Transatlantic speed records, vessels, and time consumed.

The Mauretania in 1910 made the voyage in four days, ten hours and forty-one minutes, which has not yet been surpassed; the Lusitania in 1908 came across in four days and fifteen hours, and the Lucania in 1894 lowered all previous records by making the passage in five days, seven hours and twenty-three minutes. These are the fastest runs made across the Atlantic, all by ships of the Cunard Line.

Mrs. H. C., East Lake. Please explain through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Matt. 5: 5.

Meekness is a comprehensive virtue. It includes gentleness, readiness to do good to all men, to walk humbly before God and man, and not to overrate ourselves; to be loving as well as lowly-minded, not given to worldly ambition, but zealous to yield willing obedience to God's will; quiet, self-possessed, never quarrelsome nor disputatious. See Matt. 11: 29; II. Cor. 10. 1; I. Peter 3: 4; I. Cor. 6: 7; Rom. 12: 19; I. Peter 2: 19-22; Rev. 21: 7. Thus the meek, though the "only rightful occupants of a foot of ground or a crust of bread here," are the heirs of all things hereafter.

A. S., Owensdale, Pa. What does the word "spiritual" mean as applied to Christians? We frequently hear the expression that a certain Christian is very spiritual, or not spiritual.

The word "spiritual" is one which Christians ought to guard zealously in religious phraseology. There is a recent tendency to use the word in a loose sense, giving it merely its philosophical or scientific meaning rather than its real Bible and theological significance. In secular phraseology the word means: relating to spirit, rather than to matter. Many varying shades of meaning grow out of this basic idea: one poet may be more spiritual than another; one artist than another; one musician than another. In this sense the word implies a relation to thoughts, emotions, impulses, connected with the soul of a man rather than his body. But the Christinn use of the word is distinctive. It is given as the third definition of the word in the Standard Dictionnry: "Of or relating to the soul as acted on by the Holy Spirit." An apt quotation from Henry Drummond is given: "The spiritual life is the gift of the living Spirit. The spiritual man is no mere development of the natural man. He is a new creation, born from above." In Christian phraseology, then, a man is spiritual as he is possessed, filled and dominated by the Holy Spirit.

R. G., Gambier, Ohio. 1. Why does the moon remain low in the heavens in summer and rise high in winter? 2. What causes eclipses of the sun and moon.

1. The moon is full when opposite to the sun, in other words, when the earth is between it and the sun. Now, at full moon in the summer time in northern latitudes the North Pole of the earth is inclined towards the sun and consequently inclined away from the moon, which gives the latter a large southern declination. In winter the opposite prevails, and as a result the moon rides higher in the heavens in winter and stays longer above the horizon than in summer. 2. When the full moon comes within the plane of the earth's orbit with the earth between it and the sun there is an eclipse of the moon. When the moon happens to be in the plane of the earth's orbit between the earth and sun there is an eclipse of the sun. The plane of the moon's orbit, however, is generally inclined to that of the earth's orbit at an angle of 5 degrees, 8 minutes, otherwise there would be two eclipses every month, one of the moon at full moon and one of the sun at new moon.

I. B., Brainerd, Minn. 1. Where is the coldest locality in the United States? 2. Where is the hottest?

1. Northern Montana is popularly supposed to be the coldest section, though the eastern part of your own State holds the record, a temperature of 65 degrees below zero having been registered at Fort Keogh some years ago. 2. The arid regions of the Southwest, as Arizona, are the hottest, though in this case also the record is held by a different section, the highest temperature ever recorded in the United States being that of 122 degrees at Death Valley, Calif., in the summer of 1891.

A. D. J., Richmond, Va. 1. See the question whether Jesus himself baptized discussed recently in THE MAIL-BAG. 2. Heb. 6: 4-6 is interpreted to refer to those who having begun the spiritual life, instead of persevering toward perfection, allowed themselves to fall away or backslide. Such having already had knowledge of the word of truth and having experienced a measure of peace in the pardoning love of Christ and the bestowal of the gift of the Holy Spirit (though not in all fulness) were doubly to blame for falling away. Paul did not assert that the Hebrews themselves had yet so fallen, but he warned them that if they did not persevere in going on to perfection, they would retrograde and would need to be "renewed" over again. It is the deliberate apostate, however, who sins in the light of knowledge and crucifies Christ anew whom he holds up as an object of execration. The elect abide in Christ and do not fall away, and he who abides not is "cast forth as a withered branch." The marginal reading of verse 6 in the Revised Versions makes this passage harmonize with the whole spirit of the Bible. It is impossible to renew them to repentance "the while" they crucify the Son of God afresh," etc. 3. No data available on the subject.

M. B. R., Shoshone, Idaho. When should the American flag be displayed, and what are the rules in regard to saluting it?

Your question is somewhat vague, but we shall answer it by saying it should be displayed always. Doubtless you are thinking of special occasions, such as patriotic observances and other celebrations when the flag should be more in evidence than at other times. As regards the rules of display and salutation, the flag should never be hoisted before sunrise nor allowed to remain up after sunset. When displayed the military stand at attention and salute, while the civilians should uncover. When the national colors are passing on parade spectators should, if walking, halt, and if seated, rise and uncover. On Memorial Day the flag should fly at half-mast from sunrise to noon and full staff from noon to sunset.

E. C., Indiana. Do you think an individual has salvation who, although his desires and thoughts seem to be of God, is extremely uncharitable toward everything and everybody, and is so cross that no one can bear to be near him for more than a few minutes?

Neither THE CHRISTIAN HERALD nor any other institution or person should go into the business of judging others. But a Christian who is unkind and cross is certainly an anomalous creature. If the New Testament teaches anything it teaches that the fruit of the religion of Jesus is kindness, charity, friendliness, neighborliness, love. Love is not incompatible with sternness and an earnest opposition to everything that is wrong. But the real Christian ought to convince every one who knows him that his heart is tender and kind. We ought, however, to recognize the fact that often persons with thoroughly kind hearts have a gruff and rugged exterior and manner. Also intense pain, long continued sickness, overstrained or disordered nerves will sometimes make an individual appear impatient who might otherwise be most patient. We ought to recognize these differences of temperament and the unusual strain put by circumstances upon certain souls. We should believe and experience and teach that the grace of God is great enough to remove all petulance and unkindness from the soul, but while advocating and urging this belief we should ourselves be most patient with those whose faith has not yet grasped the truth that complete deliverance from unpleasant tempers is possible.

S. M. A., Nova Scotia. Please explain John 14: 14. Does it mean that he will give anything we ask?

This passage, like all others in Scripture, should be read in connection with its surroundings. Jesus was speaking (in the discourse at table after the Supper) of the way, the truth, and the life, and of how his disciples might render acceptable service for the advancement of God's kingdom on earth. He was about to leave them and he gave them the assurance that they would be endowed with power, after his departure, to do the works that he had done. Verse 14 gave them the assurance of his continuous intercession and that their prayers would be heard and answered. He had already told them that they should seek first the kingdom and all things would be added unto them. This verse also shows his divine equality, in the words "I will do it." Our own prayers should be, as far as we are able to make them so, in line with God's will. There are many of us who may ask for things that would be for our own harm; but if we "seek first the kingdom," we have then the assurance that he will care for all our other needs, supply our wants, comfort our sorrows, relieve our hardships and take us safely through the difficult places of life. We have a right to ask for these, if we have acquired this right by belief on the Son of God and by acting in accordance with the divine will. See John 14: 12.

Miscellaneous

J. C. G., Westgrove, Pa. All of the twelve disciples were Jews. Their number was doubtless fixed upon after the analogy of the twelve tribes. They were mostly Galileans, taken from the common people, and some at least had been disciples of John the Baptist. See Matt. 12: 25; John 1: 35; Matt. 19: 28.

B. E. A., Sciota, Ill. The passage in Luke 7: 28 is interpreted to mean that although John was inferior to no prophet in respect to spiritual privileges, he was behind the least of those who were to be born of the Spirit, and admitted into fellowship with Christ. See parallel passage in Matt. 11: 11.

D. C., Fort Morgan, Colo. John's message, asking through his disciples whom he sent to Jesus, "Art thou he that should come, or look we for another?" was the result of impatience, almost of desperation. It must have seemed hard to him that his Master should let him lie so long in prison, after having been honored to announce and introduce Him at the beginning of his mission. He tried to get Jesus to speak out his mind, or at least to set his own mind at rest. See answer to another reader on this page concerning Matt. 11: 11.

G. S. I., Milford, Va. Adam means "red" and so also does the word Edom, both having relation to the ruddiness of flesh and the color of the clayey soil. See Gen. 1: 26 and 2: 7. Some commentators hold that Adam, the first man, was probably of the complexion of the Arabs or Edomites, ruddy though dark, while others take a different view. No definite theory can be formed on this subject.

A WEEKLY ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER FOR THE HOME

THE PULSE OF A SKYSCRAPER

BY DAY or night a modern city is never wholly at rest. A hundred disturbing factors are constantly setting up various vibrations which travel in every direction. The tracing out of these vibrations and their accurate measurement is a new problem among builders which has a peculiar interest for the layman as well. This problem of feeling the pulse of buildings is not limited to great cities, but often arises in comparatively small towns throughout the country. Let a train rush past the foundations of a high building, or even a low one, or a powerful wind storm beat against its walls, and the entire structure may vibrate like a giant tuning fork. Incidentally, the problem is so well understood that accidents from excessive vibration are practically unheard of. The cradle may rock but it never falls.

The World's Greatest Skyscrapers, Lower New York, as Seen From Governor's Island

The measurement of the pulselike vibrations is made much the same as that of an earthquake and almost as accurately. The marvelously delicate instruments which are depended upon for these records trace curious pulsing lines, which show at a glance just how wide an arc the building swings through, and how regular is the recurrence of the movement. These readings are accepted in court as absolutely conclusive, and it is not uncommon for damage suits involving immense sums of money to be decided by these delicate tracings.

Public opinion is all wrong, or nearly so, as to the amplitude of the vibrations of buildings both large and small. Every one has felt such vibrations, but one's sensations are apt to be very misleading. It is a surprise to many that the most violent vibrations are not felt in the extremely high buildings, as is commonly supposed, but in the comparatively low office buildings, and as a rule those of solid construction. A vibration of three sixteenths of an inch is extremely violent, for a movement of one hundredth of an inch is readily noticeable. As the records show, there is a peculiar method or rhythm in these movements, the building swaying back and forth through a given arc with the regularity of a pendulum.

Place a watch crystal upturned on your office desk or living-room table; fill it with quicksilver, and watch it for a minute. If a train passes near by, you will see the surface of the mercury violently agitated, much as a pond is rippled by a breeze. This is the simplest of all tests, and at the same time a surprisingly sensitive one. Again, place a pencil on end on your desk or table and await developments. If your building has any appreciable vibration, and the pencil is free to move on a smooth, hard surface, it will slowly but surely move in the direction of the greatest oscillation.

The Trepidometer for Measuring Vertical Vibrations

The first thing to be done in such tests is to provide some immovable object with which to compare the movement of the building itself. The base of the seismograph, or generally used recording instrument, consists of a heavy plate of glass, the sides of which are ground to be absolutely parallel. This plate rests upon four steel balls about one inch in diameter, which are perfectly spherical. The vibration of the floor beneath is taken up by the steel balls, which roll very slightly to and fro, leaving the glass bed plate at rest. The plate thus supported is assumed to be stationary.

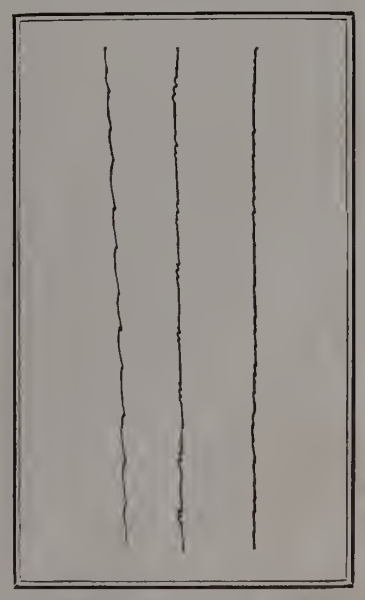
One Type of Seismograph for Measuring Lateral Vibrations

The waving line which indicated the vibration is traced by a fine pen at the end of a mechanical finger, which transmits, through a delicate mechanism, the movement of the building. An instrument, operated by clockwork, revolves under this pen the cylindrical drum of the recorder at a definite rate, usually one inch every minute. The record thus made appears upon a specially ruled sheet of paper, which is securely fastened to the drum. Records made in this way are permanent without further treatment. Another method of recording the vibration is to have the mechanical finger, which is, in this case, tipped with a fine steel stylus, moved across a plate of carefully smoked glass. In this case the stylus naturally scrapes away the soot and leaves a sharply defined white line, which accurately records the vibrations of the building. Plates of this nature are afterward varnished; then prints may be made from them as from an ordinary photographic negative. An instrument known as the trepidometer records vertical vibrations in much the same way. The mechanical finger in this case is suspended by a fine wire spring from the ceiling. The spring takes up any motion which there may be and thus leaves the pointer stationary. This pointer rests against a drum similar to that just described for one type of the seismograph, but which, in this case, vibrates with the building. The drum makes a revolution once in twenty-four hours.

The readings obtained in this way prove that one's nerves exaggerate the vibration and lead one to believe them greater than they are. One who sits in a chair, for instance, on the upper floor of a high building on a windy day readily imagines that the structure is swinging through an arc of several inches. If the chair be tilted back on two legs, the sensation will be still further exaggerated. There are many buildings where the vibration causes ink to jump from the wells, yet the seismograph shows that a vibration of three sixteenths of an inch will give this alarming result.

It has long been believed that each of the mammoth buildings of the world will vibrate in response to some special musical tone. Architects believe they have found the tones for such famous structures as the Cathedral at Cologne, Notre Dame in Paris, and St. Paul's in London. Certainly it is true that each of these buildings returns to the ear of the listener that one tone intensified and augmented to a surprising extent. The corollary statement that this keynote, if sounded long enough and with sufficient force, would bring disaster, has never been proved.

When the conversation turns to the skyscraper, one often hears timorous folks say, "Well, it's all very fine for those who like it, but I'd rather stay nearer the ground." Yet the steel and stone giants where the elevators whirl up twenty, thirty, forty, fifty stories, have stood all the tests their histories have made possible, and there, far above the dust and the turmoil of the streets, thousands pursue their business in absolute safety.



Three Different Types of Vibration Records Made by the Seismograph

FAITH AND WORKS

A SERMON

TEXT: "We conclude that a man is justified by faith without the deeds of the law." Rom. 3: 28

By Rev. John H. C. Fritz*

THUS writes Paul in his Epistle to the Romans. James says, "Ye see then how that by works a man is justified, and not by faith only." These statements taken by themselves seem to contradict each other; Paul and James appear to be at variance. The apparent contradiction, though, will entirely vanish as soon as we examine these statements in the light of their context, and Paul and James will be found to be in perfect harmony. Both apostles in making these statements are drawing a conclusion from a previous argument or presentation of facts, as the very words which introduce the statements show. Paul had taught that all men are sinners; that by the law is the knowledge of sin; that the sinner is justified before God, not by works, but by the grace of God through the redemption that is in Christ, which grace in Christ is accepted by faith. This being the case, Paul says, "We conclude that a man is justified by faith without the deeds of the law." James, in leading up to his rather pointed statement, had shown that this very faith, by which the sinner accepts his salvation in Christ, is a living faith, a productive faith, a working faith; that, though the sinner is saved by faith alone, because faith alone can lay hold of the salvation in Christ, this faith is never found alone, but is always associated with good works as the fruit and evidence of such faith. "Ye see then"—that is, this being the case, as I have shown—says James, "how that by works a man is justified, and not by faith only." James, in making his point, uses very bold language; the truth which he emphasizes has so filled his mind that he almost becomes indiscreet in his choice of words in presenting it. But we would do the apostle injustice and make him say what he did not say, if we did not carefully take in consideration all that he says and understand him in the light of his own presentation of his subject. Paul is addressing people who make everything of works and nothing of faith. James is addressing people who boast of their faith, but who fail to give the evidence of it by their works. Paul is speaking of justification, and shows that in the sinner's justification before God the works of man have no part. James is speaking of sanctification, and shows that faith always calls for the life of faith. It is the relation of works to faith that James speaks of. Two statements of fact he makes stand out very boldly: first, "faith without works is dead"; secondly, "by works faith is made perfect."

"Faith Without Works is Dead"

Faith is the simple, childlike reliance upon and confidence in God's sure and never-failing promises, especially the promise that "the blood of Jesus Christ, the Son of God, cleanses us from all sin." By such faith alone the sinner is saved. This fact needs to be emphasized—and Paul does this in a masterly manner—for self-righteousness is deeply rooted in the heart of natural man. Man by nature does not think himself to be in need of the Saviour. Though dead in his sins, natural man believes that he can do what is right and thus satisfy God. In our practical church work we meet these self-righteous people at all times and in all places; yes, the fact is that self-righteousness is found in the Christian's own sinful bosom and is ever trying to assert itself over against the grace of God in Christ. We can therefore not too often preach and emphasize the fact that our salvation is not by our works, but alone by the grace of God, given in Jesus and accepted by faith. The works of man have no part at all in the justification of the sinner before God. To the question, What must I do to be saved? there is only the one answer: "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved."

This very faith, though, James tells us is a living faith, and, being a living faith, it has the symptoms of life. James states this fact negatively when he says that "faith without works is dead." Listen: "What doth it profit, my brethren, though a man say he hath faith, and have not works?" James is not speaking of the man who actually has faith, but who only says that he has faith, though he has no good works. "Can faith"—that is, such a faith—"save him?" No, certainly not; for such a faith is no faith at all; it is no more than a mere empty word.

Such a faith, a faith without works, a mere empty faith, no faith at all, is but mere sham and mere mockery. An example, says James, will prove it to be so. "If a brother or a sister be naked and destitute of daily food and one of you say unto them, Depart in peace, be ye warmed and filled; notwithstanding ye give them not those things which are needful to the body, what doth it profit? Even so faith, if it hath not works, is dead, being alone." To say to a naked man, "I am exceedingly sorry for you, poor fellow," but then to send him away without giving him any clothes wherewith to cover his nakedness and protect his body against the heat of summer or the cold of winter; or to say to a hungry woman, "I sympathize with you greatly, poor creature," but then to send her away without a piece of bread, though one should have to share his last piece with her—all this is mere mockery, and is certainly not evidence of that "faith which worketh by love." Such a faith is a dead faith; no faith at all; a faith which exists only in the imagination of him who says that he has faith but who lacks the works of faith. "Can faith"—such faith—"save him"? Never.

The fact that a Christian must lead a Christian life needs to be emphasized; for

> By grace none find in heaven a place
> Who live in sin in hope of grace.

There are not a few who are in special need of being reminded that "faith without works is dead"; and none of us can say that he no longer needs such reminder. There is yet among us the man who prides himself on his orthodoxy, who is, perhaps, active in church work, whose conversation is made up of pious phrases, and who goes about with the stamp of piety upon his face, but who, when he has been offended, or even when he only imagines that he has been offended, will not be persuaded that as a Christian he must have and show a forgiving spirit; who will instead carry hatred about in his heart, and who, even then, will, perhaps, daily and conscientiously pray, "Forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive those who trespass against us." There is yet the man among us who calls himself a Christian, but who goes about slandering his neighbor, who lies and cheats in his business, who follows and delights in the sinful pleasures of this world, who loves his money and worships it as his god, who secretly leads an adulterous life; whose life, in short, gives the lie to his profession. These are the very people whom James has in mind when he says that "faith without works is dead."

"Head-Faith" is Valueless

The "faith" of such, James tells us, is no more than mere head-knowledge and head-faith, the like of which is found with the devil himself. "Yea, a man may say, Thou hast faith, and I have works: show me thy faith without thy works"—if this be possible—"and I will show thee my faith by my works. Thou believest that there is one God; thou doest well: the devils also believe, and tremble." The mere faith that there is a God and the mere historical faith in Christ's death and resurrection make no man a Christian. Such "faith" the very devils have; they also know these facts, but that very knowledge makes them tremble; it is these things which now seal their eternal doom in hell. The mere knowledge of these facts makes the unregenerate man shudder, for the very God whose existence he acknowledges, but whom he does not worship, is a jealous God, visiting the iniquities of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate him; and the very Saviour who shed his blood for the remission of the sins of all, but whom the unbeliever despises and rejects, will and must then appear against him as his Judge. "O vain man," who imaginest and sayest that thou hast faith, but whose faith is unproductive, "wilt thou know that faith without works is dead?"

What James has stated negatively he also stat positively by saying that "by works faith is ma perfect." He shows that faith which really d serves being so called, saving faith, is always a li ing, a productive, a working faith; a faith whic as Paul says, "worketh by love."

Paul, in making his point that man is saved n by works but alone by the grace of God in Chris which grace is accepted by faith, quotes the exar ple of Abraham, who "against hope believed hope," relying with a simple, childlike trust upo the promise of God, and whose faith—not his work —was reckoned unto him for righteousnes James, in urging the necessity of good works—t the fruit and evidence of faith—also refers Abraham. "Was not Abraham our father justifie by works," he asks, "when he had offered Isaac h son upon the altar?" James, indeed, uses bold la guage, and seems to contradict Paul. But to sa that he does so would be doing the apostle a gre injustice. We must give the apostle an opport nity to explain his words. "Seest thou," he co tinues, "how faith wrought with his works, and b works was faith made perfect?" Clearly, Jam does not teach that Abraham was justified b works to the exclusion of faith, nor that he wa justified by works at all; but he says that Abra ham's faith wrought with his works; that Abra ham's faith brought forth Abraham's works; tha Abraham's faith prompted him to offer up his so Isaac; for Abraham "staggered not at the promi of God through unbelief, but was strong in fait giving glory to God, and being fully persuaded tha what he had promised, he was able also to pe form." When James therefore tersely and bold says that Abraham was justified by works, he ha in mind a working faith, a faith which was mad perfect by works, as he expressly says. Still mo evident does it become that James is in full acco with Paul and the Scriptures as such when he add "And the Scripture was fulfilled, which sait Abraham believed God, and it"—Abraham's fait not his works—"was imputed unto him for righ eousness; and he was called the friend of God

Abraham, the Friend of God

By faith Abraham was justified, but by his work Abraham showed his faith; showed that he love God, that he was a friend of God, willing to d whatsoever God would ask of him. Our Saviou says, "If ye keep my commandments, ye shall abi in my love; even as I have kept my Father's com mandments and abide in his love. . . . Ye are m friends, if ye do whatsoever I command you." An what is our Saviour's commandment which w should keep? John tells us when he says, "Wha soever we ask, we receive of him, because we kee his commandments, and do those things that ar pleasing in his sight. And this is his command ment, that we should believe on the name of his So Jesus Christ and love one another, as he gave u commandment. And he that keepeth his comman ments dwelleth in him, and he in him. And herel we know that he abideth in us, by the Spirit whi he hath given us." Like Abraham we should al by our works show ourselves to be the friends o God; by our works our faith should be made pe fect. Not by our works is our faith vivified, bu by our works our faith is developed, is shown to b a real, a living, a working faith. This is exact what James means when, again having that subje in mind which he desires to impress upon th minds of his readers, he says very boldly, "Ye se then"—from what I have said—"how that b works"—that is, by a working faith—"a man justified, and not by faith only"; as though fait could exist without at the same time bringing fort the fruit of good works.

Introducing another example of faith made pe fect by works, James says, "Likewise also was n Rahab justified by works, when she had receive the messengers, and had sent them out anothe way?" Surely Rahab, who was a wicked woman, wa not justified because of her works, for her kind a toward the messengers of Joshua could not hav made good for her past sinful life, and cou not have rendered her acceptable in the sight of th

COMFORT

COMFORT take, thou child of sorrow,
All is ordered well for thee;
Look not for the anxious morrow—
"As thy days, thy strength shall be."

Child of grief, does this world move thee?
Transient scenes of transient pain?
Think, oh, think of worlds above thee,
Countless worlds—a glorious train!

There are mansions now preparing For the chosen heirs of God—
Here a pilgrim and wayfaring,
There shall be thy long abode!

There shalt thou abide forever
With thy best and greatest Friend;
Naught from him thy soul shall sever,
In a world that knows no end.

There, amidst assembled nations,
Eye to eye and face to face,
Thou shalt see thy tribulations,
Sent as messengers of grace.

Comfort take, then, child of sorrow,
All is ordered well for thee:
Look not to the anxious morrow—
"As thy days thy strength shall be."

A body in which no breath is t is pronounced to be dead, and htly so. As the breath, though, es not give life to the body, but is e result of life and the evidence of e, so good works do not make faith, precede it, but are the result of ith and the evidence of faith.

Do You Believe?

The relation of works to faith hav-g been brought so clearly and forci-y to our attention, it now remains r each to answer the question, Do u believe, or do you not believe? you merely say that you have ith, or have you faith? If that ith of which you boast is a dead ith, a faith which is alone, without rks, then take it from James that is no faith at all. If you have a ith which trusts the promises of d, especially the promise that Jesus mers does receive, then it is a liv-g faith, and, being a living faith, it ll necessarily be a working faith; faith which seeks to do those things ich are pleasing in the sight of d; a faith which loves God and the ighbor; a faith "which worketh by ve." To such a faith God has given e promise of great and glorious op-rtunities and possibilities. Let us to the Lord who has by his Gospel t such faith within our hearts, and plore him with his apostles, saying, ord, increase our faith."

Blest be thy love, dear Lord,
That taught us this sweet way,
Only to love thee for thyself,
And for that love obey.

THE HEART'S KEY

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

A BIRD sang outside in the sunlight, as if defying pain, and unhappiness, and death; but in the consulting-room of the big, grim hospital the Old Doctor sat, head in hands, silent, immovable as fate. For it was charity day at the hospital. So the Old Doctor sat and waited for the interesting cases to come in. All patients, rich or poor, old or young, were "cases" to the Doctor. An operation—one of those terrible operations where a family pray for the hundredth chance—was to him only a pleasure. For it meant a time to match his skill and his wits with death, and when he won, why, the patient lived, and he had shown his power over the apparently impossible. And when he came out of the sick-room with no emotion visible on his cold, gray face, men looked at him, and looking said: "This man has no heart!"

The Old Doctor had had a heart once; when he was a young man with great promise before him. He had been engaged to a sweet young girl, and men thought the kindest things of her and spoke of him with love and respect. A few days before the wedding a little note, written in violet ink, came to him ending the romance. And the Doctor had thrown away the key of his soul and buried his empty heart.

Then the war broke out! Everywhere were enlisting stations, and men marched out of town singing; strong-armed, handsome boys, who never returned; and the Doctor with a hope for death in his heart went to the front. He was brave, fearless, and fortunate, this doctor; and when men saw his courage of battle, he was given command of a company of reckless souls who, like their captain, played with death. And often when he returned to a camp with only a handful of followers, and stepped over the maimed and dying on the way to his tent, while the air rang with the cries of men who prayed for relief in death, he smiled the grim smile that covered his broken heart. No wonder operating rooms and lifeless bodies held no horror for him.

ONLY once had the Doctor's heart shown itself during the war; and then . . . It was during a great battle, and there had been a fierce assault. The captain was well toward the front, raining blow for blow. Smoke hung heavily about him, so heavily, in fact, that he could not see a tall foeman threatening him with uplifted saber. Then he was conscious of a quick flash of blue steel. He felt rather than saw a large, bony hand push him back, while a homely head was thrust in front, and received full in the face the stinging saber cut that was meant for himself. The captain, all physician now, bent over the wounded man and recognized the most unattractive, profane man in his company. Taking him up in his arms, he bore his bleeding comrade from the field.

The Doctor had seen his savior only once since that far-off day. The wounded soldier had been sent home. His head was bandaged, and his form was thin, but there was real feeling in his voice as he said: "God keep you Cap, till we meet again!" and the Doctor had choked down a sob as he wrung the emaciated hand. Though he had never been able to understand the man's devotion, he had appreciated it, and he kept it in the storehouse of his memory with other treasures.

He had come out of the war unscathed, unafraid. And when he had attached himself to one of the largest hospitals, and acquired great skill and fame as a surgeon, men respected him, even while they spoke of his "lack of heart."

OTHERS were coming into the consulting room: four doctors, an interne, and a nurse. The Old Doctor answered their greeting with a nod of his gray head and a flash of the steely eyes. And the youngest doctor whispered to the nurse: "I'd hate the Old Doc, if I didn't admire him so much."

The specimens were beginning to come in now, hollow-eyed men and women; dirty, friendless, hopeless. And the doctors examined them carefully but without interest, while the interne took notes, and the nurse repressed a shudder. Ever the Old Doctor's emotionless voice went on in the same questions: "How did it start? Why didn't you come sooner? Afraid? Well, you've got something to be afraid of now!" And in answer to their piteous questions: "What? Going to die? Shouldn't be a bit surprised. You're too old to talk that way; keep still. For heaven's sake, don't cry, man—you're no baby. Come sooner next time, that's all!" And the doctors, who could not disguise their feelings, shuddered at the older physician's harsh words.

Then an old man, bent, white-haired, and feeble, came slowly in. . . . His face was covered with a thick bandage; his pale eyes wandered restlessly among the doctors. When the Old Doctor thundered out, "Hurry up there!" he started, then relapsed again into patient hopelessness, while the nurse and interne removed the heavy covering from around his head. For the cancer was on his cheek. The doctors leaned forward in their chairs, and the color flew from the nurse's face as the Old Doctor made the examination. It was going to be an interesting case. "How long since it began?" the Old Doctor asked crossly, but his hard face showed an interest that he could not hide. "Two years ago," said the man carelessly. "Cause?" the Old Doctor shot the word out like a bullet, and again the man started. "Sabre wound," he said shortly. The Old Doctor dropped his professional manner, and the other surgeons sat forward in their chairs, more interested than they had been in some time. "The Civil War?" asked the Old Doctor very softly, and the bent old man straightened instinctively as he nodded his head. But the Old Doctor grasped the thin, badly-shaped hand, much to the surprise of his audience. "Why, man," he cried, "in what battle were you hurt? Tell me, what battle?" The colorless eyes brightened, and the outcast man had grasped the Doctor's hand with two trembling fists: "Lord love us," he gasped, "if it isn't the old Cap!" With a wave of his hand the Old Doctor motioned the others from the room.

WHEN they reached the hall the youngest doctor turned to the nurse.

"What do you know about that?" he gasped; but the nurse had her handkerchief to her eyes.

"Go 'way!" she whispered; "didn't you see? The Old Doctor was crying!"

MY CHILDREN

CHILDREN twain has the good Lord given
To cheer my lot in the world below.
(One is on earth and another in heaven,
But neither is lost to me, I know.)

For one beside my bed is sleeping
Secure, though tempests rack and chafe,
And one in kindly angel-keeping
Within my Father's house is safe.

Swiftly as speeds the fleeing arrow,
The younger passed from our brief control;
But God, who numbers the falling sparrow,
Counted, I know, the little soul.

And so I walk not broken-hearted,
As one who grieves to hope no more;
For though the cruel Past has parted,
The heavenly Future shall restore.

One living child beside me lingers,
To cheer and brighten my dwelling place.
There is joy in the clasp of his little fingers;
There is bliss in the look in his little face.

So one shall walk in the world to love me
And cheer my soul when I drop and sigh;
And one shall shine like a star above me
And light me heavenward when I die!

Great Temperance Congress

ON DECEMBER 16, 325 delegates from thirty-three States attended a congress of the various temperance organizations of the country in Washington City. The exercises were held in the First Congregational Church. Dr. Howard H. Russell, the founder of the Anti-Saloon League, called the congress to order, and Rev. Dr. A. J. Barton, of Texas, was made chairman, and Rev. S. E. Nicholson was made secretary. The meeting was in the interest of the Kenyon-Sheppard amendment to the Inter-State Commerce Bill, forbidding the transfer of liquors from "wet" into "dry" territory.

Major Merwin, General Daggett, Dr. Wilbur F. Crafts, and others made addresses. At night Colonel Woolley made an address. On the 17th and 18th, the Anti-Saloon League held a National Conference with two hundred representatives. Bishop Luther Wilson presided at the meeting on December 18, and addresses were made by P. A. Baker, Howard H. Russell, E. C. Dinwiddie, Ernest Cherrington, A. J. Barton and others. The conference listened to a proposal to raise $500,000 for the prosecution of the work, $250,000 of this amount to be used in establishing branch printing plants for the Anti-Saloon League. Mr. Corcoran, a wealthy layman of Baltimore, started the enterprise with a subscription of $10,000. On the 18th there was a memorable banquet to three hundred guests in the assembly hall. Bishop Luther Wilson, the presiding officer, announced Congressman Morris Sheppard of Texas as the toastmaster, and speeches were made by Senators Kenyon of Iowa and Saunders of Tennessee, by Colonél Maus, Mr. Corcoran, Filmore Condit, F. C. Iglehart, Ex-Congressman Miller, General Daggett and others. Senator Kenyon and Senator-elect Sheppard said in their speeches that they believed that the Kenyon-Sheppard Bill would pass. Senator Saunders of Tennessee told how he and a friend had urged the administration to prevent the use of the parcel post in the carrying of liquors. The statement had been published that the passage of the Kenyon-Sheppard Bill would destroy at a stroke at least one-third of all the drinking places in the country.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD IN SWEDEN

Please accept my heartiest thanks for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. It is a gift to me from an American lady. It comes safe every week. It has been a great blessing to me during all this time. If I could pay for it myself, I would never be without it as long as I live. It is the best religious paper I have ever read. I count it as next to my dear Bible. Thanks also for The Christian Herald Almanac, which contains so much valuable information. God bless THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and its work, is the wish of your more than pleased reader.

THE "SCHOOL" THAT WAS FARTHEST WEST

AN ISLAND of volcanic origin, made up of bleak hills and frozen salt marshes; a short summer, the temperature averaging less than forty degrees, when the tundra grass and lichens grow, and quickly-maturing wild flowers, but most of the year a waste of snow and ice set in an icy sea, whose currents carry the ice-floes down and pack them in great hummocks twenty or thirty feet high along the shore, until the currents themselves are frozen; emphasizing this desolation an Eskimo settlement of three hundred souls; and in the midst, like a protecting angel (which in truth it is), a schoolhouse floating the Stars and Stripes.

Less than ten degrees west is the 180th parallel, where East begins again; and it has always been known as "The Schoolhouse Farthest West," until recently a school has been established at Atka, on one of the Aleutian Islands, three degrees still farther west. St. Lawrence Island is the most isolated of Alaska's United States Government school and reindeer stations. The natives, until the introduction of reindeer, subsisted wholly by hunting and fishing. In summer myriads of migratory sea birds go to the island to nest. There are some wild animals. such as the white bear and white fox, but the chief dependence is the walrus, seal and whale. The "staff of life" is chunks of fat, raw walrus flesh, which even little children eat with relish.

The nearest land is Indian Point, Siberia, forty miles away. Since nobody knows when, the natives traded ivory, walrus skins, and skin canoes to the Indian Point natives for reindeer skins and bear skins. They were often compelled to trade against their will, and many battles were fought, sometimes almost to the extermination of the St. Lawrence people.

The plain, one-story schoolhouse, with living rooms in the rear, to which the wing has since been added, was built more than twenty years ago by the Episcopalians for a mission, at a cost of $3,000. About that time, the missionary at Cape Prince of Wales was murdered by three of his schoolboys, and it was decided St. Lawrence was too remote and dangerous, and the idea was abandoned. Later, the Presbyterians purchased the building for $2,000. In 1894 the United States cutter Bear landed a missionary and his wife, Mr. and Mrs. Gambell, at the schoolhouse, together with a year's supply of provisions, coal and other necessaries.

"My wife cried a little from loneliness as the Bear steamed away," said Mr. Gambell, and no wonder. What might not happen before the cutter came next year, with news of the outside world? After three years of thrilling and dangerous experiences, with a large measure of success, the missionaries returned to Seattle for a vacation, taking with them a little daughter, born in their exile. On their way back to the island the schooner was lost at sea with all on board. To this day the natives believe the Gambells lost their lives because he removed one of their sacred stones that was in the way of a building. The settlement was given the name of Gambell.

The United States Government found the mission stations the only effective centers for any efforts toward the elevation of the natives, and it was at this point that the Government assumed charge of the Gambell school, and has since supplied the teachers.

Since 1901, with the exception of a year's vacation, Dr. and Mrs. Edgar O. Campbell of Santa Barbara, California, have cast their lot with the Eskimos of Gambell, until last year, when it was necessary for them to return to civilization.

The story of Robinson Crusoe is not more interesting than the experiences of these missionary teachers, with cold, famine, pestilence, Indian Point natives, liquor and other conditions that would try the stoutest hearts. When Captain Jack, a noted character from Indian Point, source of much drunkenness, rioting and untold trouble, attempted the life of one of the former teachers, the revenue cutter fortunately was near, and Jack was put in irons and deported to Indian Point.

In addition to the duties of teacher, preacher, physician, surgeon general and general caretaker, Dr. Campbell was also superintendent of a government reindeer herd.

A marked characteristic of the natives is love for their children, whom they govern by moral suasion. So exalted is their idea of obedience that formerly when a parent was old or sick and about to die, an asked his son to take his life, he did not think refusing—a practice not yet wholly obsolet In mental ability the school children compare unfavorably with children of other races. The are fond of sports, shared in by their elders. Running and jumping are paramount, for in huntin walruses on the ice it is often necessary to run f their lives and make incredible leaps when the i opens up. They coast on the do sleds, jump the rope, play tag, an hop-skip-and-jump. Before the i troduction of American gam they had a ball game of their ow A soft leather-covered ball, pe haps six inches across, is toss from boy to boy, the girls endea oring to intercept it. When t girls succeed they do the tossin until the boys secure it again.

The natives who are very clea (some of them have learned to l as clean as white people) are a mitted to the cozy rag-carpete sitting-room of the schoolhou mission, which also serves as a l brary, medical dispensary, wor room, nursery for Eskimo childre and, not infrequently, hospita The kitchen is made as sanitary possible, and is open to all come at all reasonable times.

In addition to the reindeer bus ness, which is their coming indu try and means of livelihood, t natives are being taught to ru their own power-boats, carpente ing, blacksmithing and the lik and they are taught better metho of preserving and marketing the fish, tanning skins and marketin products of native industry, such a baskets and ivory work.

There is a good workbench, a blacksmithing ou fit, a grindstone, stocks and dies, a polishing lath for ivory, a fur-sewing machine, a laundry and a organ, always ready for any who wish to use then

In the evening the schoolroom is warmed an lighted and converted into a club or reading-roo the whalers, as well as natives, availing themselve of its advantages, though new literature arriv only with the annual mail.

On the departure of the Campbells, Miss Ande son, of Lincoln, Neb., who for several years ha been an assistant teacher on a considerably le salary than she could command elsewhere, took fu charge, with Miss Ingwaldson as assistant. Th were the only white people. While there we those who would have done them harm, there we others who would defend them with their lives, a the outcome was watched with much interest a no little anxiety by those who knew of their unde taking; but the revenue cutter next year fou them in good health and with reports of a succes ful year.

Last summer, a Dr. and Mrs. Reed of Idaho, w have three small children, were sent to the fa away school.

They, like nearly all the teachers of northwes ern Alaska, have taken the appointments as means of reaching the natives with the Gosp though their missionary work is entirely indepen ent of the school. It requires all the courage, fo titude and trust in the Divine power of whic human beings are capable, and men and wom could not be induced to stay in the arctic region i such complete isolation were they not imbued wi the exalted purpose that is the missionary spir everywhere.

The Schoolhouse That Was Farthest West

TOPICS OF INTEREST AT HOME AND ABROAD

—IT IS EASY to criticize the religious methods of the preacher. Zion's Herald relates the following: "A clerical critic of Dr. Torrey said to Mr. Alexander: 'I don't like the way Dr. Torrey does it.' 'Well,' replied Mr. Alexander, 'I don't think that he altogether likes the way he does things, but he can't seem to find any better way.' Then, turning to the critic, Mr. Alexander asked: 'And how do you do it?' 'Oh, I don't do it at all!' was the response. 'Well, then,' said the patient Alexander, returning to the charge, 'I like the way Dr. Torrey does it much better than the way in which you don't do it!'"

—ACCORDING TO THE view of Mr. Benjamin De Casseres, expressed in an article in the St. Louis Mirror, education is the Pandora box from which the morbidity of our moral affliction spring to torment us. His attitude may be gauged from his blunt assertion that Catholicism is right in its antagonistic stand against secular education. "All learning," he writes, "as such, leads to atheism, materialism, cynicism, crime, suicide." Credulity and ignorance are the real bases of civilization, progress and happiness. Ignorance is beneficial. Our veils make us happy; our souls live on the winds of doubt." He could hardly have written a more conclusive argument against his own text than he has done. One need only look at the condition of those countries where Roman Catholic influence has prevailed for centuries and kept the people in ignorance to find evidence of the results of such rule. Spain, Italy, Portugal, Mexico, South America, and until recently the Philippines, furnish examples of the kind of "happiness" that results from the masses being kept in a state of illiteracy. Against Mr. Casseres's wonderful discovery, we may place the opinion of the distinguished Baroness von Suttner, now visiting this country, who pronounces America "a hundred years ahead" of the older lands in all that tends toward civilized progress, social uplift and general enlightenment.

—THE WOMAN SUFFRAGE movement is traveling fast and far. A correspondent of the Boston Transcript, writing in Persia, describes a recent scene in the National Assembly of that country while the electoral bill was under discussion. One member, Vakil El Rooy, arose and referred to the clause in the bill declaring that no woman could vote. He announced, for the first time in all the thousands of years that the Persian Empire has existed, that women "had souls and should have the right to vote." The Assembly was thunderstruck! Members sprang to their feet in horrified protest. Some predicted terrible things as the result of this blasphemous utterance, one even going so far as to declare that it meant the downfall of Islam. Another, looking daggers at Vakil El Rooy, moved that no record be made in the journal of the Assembly of this dreadful proposition. Then it was excluded by a unanimous vote of the members, who applauded. It is evident that Persia has a long way to travel before it does justice to its women, as so many other countries are now doing.

—IN HIS EVIDENCE given before the Congressional Committee in Washington, J. Pierpont Morgan declared that a money trust was impossible in this country, or anywhere else. He said: "There is no way in which any one man can get a monopoly of control of money. Even assuming such a thing to be possible, he would immediately lose that control, were he to abuse it. In his opinion, he could never succeed in carrying through a proposition in a board of directors against the wishes of the stockholders. He favored competition to a reasonable extent, but preferred combination. He approved of legitimate speculation, and regarded legislation preventing speculation as inadvisable. Nobody could prevent the public from buying low and selling high. He was four hours on the stand, and answered very frankly all questions put to him by the committee. The special object of the investigation being the alleged existence of a Money Trust, the statement having been made that there was such a trust composed of "interlocking directorates," which controlled $25,000,000,000.

THE ROYAL MESSAGE FROM BULGARIA

QUEEN ELEANOR COMMENDS THE PHILANTHROPY OF THE CHRISTIAN HERALD READERS AND EXPRESSES HER HOPE FOR THE CARE OF THE ORPHANS OF THE WAR. THE PROGRESS OF THE RELIEF WORK. STEPS TOWARD PEACE AT ST. JAMES

AT THE audience which Her Majesty Queen Eleanor granted to the representatives of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Relief Committee, we were most cordially received by the Queen herself. She commended very highly and very sincerely the Christian philanthropy of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and its readers and friends. She said in substance: 'I hope for abundant generosity on the part of the larger and more favored nations, especially on behalf of the thousands of orphans created by this war. I have the care and welfare of these children for whom everything remains to be done, very much at heart, and my prayer is that we may be able to save them from the depths of poverty and the consequent retarded development.'"

The Greek Fleet in Phaleron Bay Just Before it Started Out to Take Possession of the Turkish Islands in the Ægean Sea

This message is a part of a recent cablegram in which Pastor Furnajieff acknowledges the receipt of the remittances which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has forwarded from the Balkan Relief Fund. Mr. Furnajieff and Mr. Atanasoff, the treasurer of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Relief Committee, are now in the field making investigations and distributing relief. Pastor Furnajieff's last letter comes from the village of Simitli in Macedonia. It reads in part as follows:

"Thanks to the generosity of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers scores and hundreds of present-day Macedonians are lifting grateful eyes to heaven for the sympathy of your people. As we work through these regions that have become destitute and cursed by the war, we wish you could realize the situation as we do. We have taken pictures to tell the story in part, but one must see the situation if he is to realize its gravity. We passed through several villages yesterday where we found appalling misery. One-third of the houses in two of them are in ashes. The houses that remain have been robbed of all clothing and food, and can serve for the present only as shelter to the returning fugitives. I say shelter, for rarely the windows or even the doors are left standing. Two other villages we visited remain with not a house burnt (they are both Turkish), but all their provisions are gone. Now the houses, some with doors torn off and all without a window left, serve as shelters to the homeless, cold, and hungry families of the whole village regions near by. The grain of these villages was fed out to the thousands of teams of horses and oxen and the cavalry horses on their hasty pursuit of the enemy.

"We are witnesses that war is a time when men lose their reason. War is brutal; war is heartless; war is savagery. But what can we do for the innocent thousands of non-combatants, now at a time when only liberal food supplies can save the lives of the people? The military authorities have saved a part of the food and have been distributing grain to some families, but this is far from sufficient even for the present need, and what will they have on hand to sow the fields as spring approaches? Hundreds of these people have only bread to eat, while still other hungry crowds around them have practically nothing. We pity these people and appeal to you, dear reader, to ask yourself what would the Golden Rule of the Master ask of you? We appeal to you on behalf of these destitute, homeless and starving people.

"Last evening we stayed till very late in a Turkish house, where we discussed Christianity and Mohammedanism. The five members of the household fully approved all we presented to them about Christ, only at the end, as we told them they ought to accept him, they were silent. They were very, very grateful for our visit and attention, and their hodja (pastor) and chief villager told us very pathetically: 'If it were not for the sympathy of Christian people and the government, we'd all die.'"

The need in other sections of Macedonia is growing daily more acute, and steps will be taken as rapidly as possible for its relief. From Bitoljia, near Monastir, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD received this cablegram a few days ago: "Thousands destitute; help needed."

Rev. W. C. Cooper, writing from Salonica a few weeks ago, said:

"The sudden and swift campaign of the Balkan allies has driven the Turkish population into our city like hares fleeing before a hunting party. They came by hundreds and by thousands; on foot, on pack animals, on carts piled high with their few earthly possessions, and in trains filled to overflowing, and with even women and children on top of passenger coaches. The city government placed them in the numerous mosques, and, for a time, fed them with bread; but, as the fall of the city drew near, these bread rations were discontinued.

"The Moslem population is everywhere cowed and helpless. The strange fear which caused the armies in this part of Macedonia to run helter-skelter, throwing away arms, blankets, knapsacks, canteens, and clothing, seems to have acted upon the entire population, and they are helpless as a flock of sheep. The Turks living in the city have taken a great many into their own homes, and there are still thousands at the mosques to be fed by charity. The American missionaries, seeing men, women and children starving at their doors, could do nothing else but take what little funds they have and invest in bread and feed the hungry so long as money held out. They are co-operating with a committee, the honorary head of which is Queen Olga of Greece, who is now here with the king. The Greek pastor, Mr. Aristides Mehitsopolous; the German pastor, Mr. Bruneau; and the wife of the newly appointed Greek governor of the provinces take part in the work.

"With the help of the Mohammedan priests officiating in these mosques, we have obtained complete lists of the responsible heads of the various families, and have granted to every head of a family a ticket showing the number of members in his household, babies in arms not being counted. The lists thus collected aggregate about ten thousand people to-day, and is constantly growing. For every four persons one loaf is given; thus, each person has one fourth of a loaf of dry bread as his food supply for twenty-four hours."

"Why then did we fight?" "What is the return for our victories?" "It is a mockery and not a serious conference!" Such were the shouted exclamations of the envoys of the Balkan Allies when they had listened to Turkey's counter proposals for peace in the Near East. Dr. Daneff, chief of the Bulgarian delegates, was much excited. Shaking his arms in the air, he exclaimed: "For whom then have we fought?" Mr. Lazar Miyuskovitch, a Montenegrin representative, shouted with a firm voice: "I am going to pack and return to resume my place at the front!" while Stojan Novakevitch, who is called "the Servian Bismarck," said dryly: "The Turks have not yet learned that honesty is the best policy." All the delegations left St. James's Palace in a highly excited state, the Greeks leading the way.

The Turkish document that precipitated all this disturbance was read by Rechad Pasha, and demanded that the province of Adrianople remain under the direct administration of Turkey; that Macedonia be converted into a principality with Salonica as its capital, the principality to be under the suzerainty of the Sultan of Turkey, but governed by a prince chosen by the Balkan allies and nominated by the Sultan of Turkey, this prince to be a Protestant and from a neutral State; that Albania be autonomous under the sovereignty of the Sultan and governed by a prince of the imperial Ottoman family, who is to be chosen for a term of five years, with the possibility of renewal of his appointment; that all the islands in the Ægean Sea remain Turkish, and that discussion of the Cretan question be left for settlement between Turkey and the great Powers.

On January 2 the first definite progress was made in the Peace Conference. The Turks on that date abandoned their dilatory tactics, and their leader submitted to the following definite proposals:

The cession to the Allies of the Turkish provinces in Europe to the west of the vilayet of Adrianople.

The autonomy of Albania, within boundaries to be determined by the great Powers.

The future of Crete to be reserved for decision by the Powers that act as guarantors under the suzerainty of the Sultan.

Turkey refuses to surrender the Ægean Islands, which are claimed as possessions of Asiatic, not European Turkey.

After an hour of private consideration, the Allies informally discussed the proposals with the Turks, assenting to the plan outlined for Albania, and agreeing that a rectification of the national boundaries in Thrace must be made. The Bulgarians refused, however, to give up their claim on Adrianople, and the conference adjourned to allow the Turks to communicate with Constantinople.

The Unseen Witnesses

WE HAVE before us a letter from a reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD who has lately suffered a great bereavement. The writer says: "Your figure of speech that 'death is only a veil' and 'transparent to those on the other side' is a beautiful thought to me. A near and dear one has lately passed over. What grounds have we for such a belief?"

This is a type of many other letters of a similar character that reach us from time to time. Yet a little reflection, a little searching of God's own word as revealed to us in the Scriptures, would suffice to bring to those troubled souls the sweet assurance they are longing for. In the twelfth chapter of Hebrews, the writer says that we are encompassed by a great "cloud of witnesses." He borrowed this figure from the amphitheatre, where a vast assemblage "witnessed" the contests with eager attention, and he applied it to the spiritual struggle going on here on earth, which is watched by the multitude of unseen heavenly witnesses. It was of these that Milton wrote:

> Millions of spiritual creatures walk the earth
> Unseen, both when we wake and when we sleep.

At the Transfiguration on the "Mount of Vision," the three disciples saw the faces of Moses and Elias as they talked with Jesus. In the parable of Dives and Lazarus, Jesus himself pictured the same thought of the personal interest of those who had passed from earth in the welfare of those who remain. But there are other watchers who bring reinforcement to troubled souls here—heavenly hosts, like those that filled the mountains around Dothan when Elijah, knowing them to be present and seeing them with the eye of faith, prayed that the eyes of his servant might be opened to the same glorious vision, and they were opened accordingly. We, too, if we have the faith to look, may become aware of the presence of the divine battalions in the heavens, watching our acts, sympathizing with our hopes and our prayers, joining with us in our triumphs, and helping us up after our failures. "The whole camp of God," says a spiritual writer of our own day, "is glittering with lights, while sentinels such as ourselves are standing in the darkness invisible." Who can estimate the strength, the impulse, the courage which such a thought and so sublime a conviction should give to the soul of the sojourner on earth?

Then there are within this spiritual sphere countless numbers of our living friends, though we may never know or meet them, who by their prayers and their sympathy assist in giving force and direction to our lives.

To these multitudes of "witnesses" in the natural and spiritual worlds we must add the greatest Witness of all—God himself, whose beneficent Omniscience and protecting care and guidance are over all his works. If it were not enough to know that he understands our needs, hears and answers our prayers; that he has numbered the very hairs of our head; then let us remember that he has done more than all this, for he so loved the world that he sent his own Son to save it. And we, who trust in him, have a Comforter, also his messenger, as our guide and teacher while we are here. Thus not only are we surrounded by God's love and kindness, but all heaven and earth are full of witnesses, although we only see them with the eyes of faith; but when we have passed over, then we shall see with unveiled face and know more of the goodness and care that have surrounded us here.

Turkey-In-Asia!

THE first definite hopes of peace during the session of the plenipotentiaries at London appeared on January 2, when Rechad Pasha, the representative of Turkey, declared that his government was willing to relinquish all its European territory except the vilayet of Adrianople and the small strip of land lying between that city and Constantinople. Bulgaria made a vigorous stand to gain Adrianople as her own possession, and Greece was eager to secure the Ægean Islands. But with the fate of Albania and Crete left to the Powers and the great objective gained of driving Turkey practically out of Europe, the final settlement of details was not supremely difficult.

It is interesting to forecast the influence the Balkan States will have henceforth in the politics of Europe. It is to be hoped that the Allies, having stood together throughout the rigors of war and the subtleties of diplomacy, will stand together as they settle down to the pursuits of peace. More compactly united than ever in their history, with a new spirit of hope and vigor born of their splendid martial triumphs, they will stand as a barrier against Turkish aggression and as a bulwark for the Christian faith in Europe. While Servia may not be allowed the fulfilment of her hope for a port on the Adriatic, she will have practically the same advantage by being allowed free passage to an Albanian port. The Montenegrins, probably the most habitual warriors of the Allies, will, it is hoped, use their fine prowess in splendid developments of the agricultural and industrial resources of their mountain homeland. Bulgaria, which has made quick history for herself during the past few decades, becomes a still greater power, and Greece is given a further opportunity to regain more of her ancient glories.

Most interesting is the question: "What will Turkey do now?" It would be ungracious at this time to emphasize her errors of the past. With the faith of the people based upon a false religion, her ideals of the rights of human life so often wrong, she has been out of place in Europe. She becomes now in fact what she has been so long in spirit, an Asiatic State. Her face is toward the past; her hopes for national health and greatness and achievement are growing dim. But the path toward national purity, toward a policy of protection and justice for all her inhabitants and dependencies, lies clear before her. Let Christendom pray and hope that, chastened as she has been by the cruel war now ending, she may take that path.

The Convicted Dynamiters

AFTER a full and fair trial in the Federal Court in Indianapolis, thirty-eight of the forty accused members of the International Association of Structural Ironworkers have been convicted of participation in the dynamite conspiracy cases. Five of the accused are under suspension of sentence, and the remainder have been sentenced to various terms of imprisonment of from one to six years. Frank M. Ryan, president of the Union, received the severest sentence—seven years—while Vice-President Butler, Secretary Hockin, Secretary Tveitmoe and three other prominent officials got six years apiece. This remarkable trial and its result will establish in the minds of unions throughout the country the principle that, in disputes between labor and capital, the resort to violence can never be justified and is certain to bri about its own punishment. These men were sho by conclusive evidence to have instigated a financed over ninety dynamite outrages in differe States during the last seven years. The crim of which they were guilty, directly and inc rectly, were so startling as to be almo incredible. They were conspirators against economic order as beneficent to the work here as in any country on the globe. It w this same union of which John J. McNama was secretary-treasurer when he planned and ca ried out the explosion at Los Angeles, out of whi the present trial and its convictions grew. Tl disclosures that followed were of such a charact and so far-reaching that it became the duty of t Federal authorities to make the investigation tho ough and the punishment exemplary. That the a cused did not get the full penalty of the law w wholly due to the leniency of the court. Mea while, the universal conviction is that the guilt chiefs and their allies have got their just due, an that their conviction and sentence should det other wrong-headed persons from applying phys cal violence in labor disputes. Will it have th salutary effect? If ever the skirts of labor are t be cleared of contamination, it must be by the ado tion of a policy of instant repudiation of ever measure of lawlessness and violence. Orchard, th McNamaras, and later the Structural Ironworke dynamite criminals were all in turn objects c union sympathy and support, which was as mis placed as it was undeserved. Our laws are equall just to labor and capital, and protect the worker a fully as the employer. The Indianapolis sentence meet the approval of the whole country and shoul stand as a wholesome warning for the future.

The Zionists and Jerusalem

DR. MAX NORDAU, president of the Tent Zionist Congress, foresees in the impendin partition of Turkey an opportunity for carryin out the Zionists' policy of Jewish restoration i Palestine. Four hundred thousand Jews, he write will be prepared loyally to carry out any plan an to bear their share of any burden which looks t Jewish restoration. There are one hundred thou sand Jews in Palestine to-day, and he believes tha if conditions were favorable, there would be an im mediate influx of his race to the old land, ready t buy the soil at a higher price than any other pur chaser. His idea is to make of Jerusalem an Ot toman national city. Another scheme has als been suggested, viz.: that the allied forces of Chris tendom should purchase outright from Turkey th Holy City and possibly all Palestine. Turkey after the war, will need money. Would it sell Pal estine and thus repair its shattered finances From Sinai to Damascus and from the land o Moab to the Mediterranean is a territory in whic the Ottoman Empire has no specifically "sacred' places of its own, while to the Christian people every foot of the soil is hallowed. Such a purchas would be a bloodless conquest. Europe and Amer ica alone would contribute more than sufficien funds. Jerusalem could be made a "free city" an the Jews themselves, it is believed, would gladl co-operate in such a movement, which would giv promise of the reclamation of their ancient seat Many will regard the scheme as visionary, but w are living in strange and wonderful times. Such a plan would necessarily involve the official co-opera tion of all the Christian powers, East and West, a its stability could not otherwise be guaranteed.

Dr. Jowett's Meditations

IF WE could only walk every morning along th borders of Beulah Land, and breathe the refresh ing airs of that delightful country, how much bette equipped we would be for the every-day cares an trials of life! Such delightful morning rejuvenatio is found in the Daily Meditations, which Rev. Dr Jowett is contributing to every issue of THE CHRIS TIAN HERALD, and which are proving a source o spiritual health and invigoration to a multitude o renders. Several have written to us in the expecta tion that the Meditations would have been in book form. We should have made it quite clear in our announcement that not a book, but a series of arti cles was contemplated by the good doctor. It was his thought that the daily help should be ready for the daily task, the "morning song" to cheer, the draught of "living water" to sweeten the day's trials. Seven of these meditations will appear in every issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD during 1913.

Storm Drives Ship Aground

AT FOUR o'clock in the morning before Christmas, the wireless station at Atlantic City, N.J., caught this message: "Turrialba ashore off Barnegat. Heavy snowsquall. Ship afloat ft. Fast forward. Assistance necessary. Signed by Captain Lindsey." The operator gave the alarm mmediately, and to the life-saving stations at Atntic City, at Little Egg Harbor, at North and outh Brigantine, at Barnegat, and at Abescon the ord was flashed that the 5,000-ton fruit steamhip Turrialba, the largest one of the line, on her naiden trip had gone ashore on the sandbars which tretch out into the water for miles along the coast etween Cape May and Asbury Park. The ship had crew of eighty, a list of fifty-seven passengers, nd a heavy cargo of fruit and other articles. Before daylight the United States revenue cutter Seneca started from Tompkinsville, Staten Island, nder the command of Captain Charles E. Johnson ith a crew of eight officers and sixty-five men. he snowstorm was blowng so savagely that the Seneca and the wrecking essels had to halt at Sandy Hook for a while, nd then the Seneca hasened to the ship's side nd brought hope and joy o all on board the illated vessel. Meanwhile he men of the life-saving ervice on the coast were naking the heroic atempts at rescue that alvays characterize them. Captain Lambert Parker nd the crew of the Abeson Life-Saving Station vere among the first to ttempt to put out to the Turrialba. They launched heir self-baling, noninkable craft, a powerboat, and got beyond the breakers, but in the atempt to make the two niles to the ship through he bad wind and water he engine broke down nd the boat was thrown bout as a cork and onto he shore, the men barely scaping with their lives. The power-boat of the Asbury Park station started on its twenty-fivenile journey for rescue, when the engine stopped nd they had to go back o port. From Little Egg Harbor, North and South Brigantine and Barnegat the life-saving crews succeeded in launching their crafts. Many hours elapsed before the storm subsided sufficiently o transfer the passengers to the Seneca, which was lone without the loss of a man, woman or child or piece of baggage. A large quantity of bananas was thrown into the sea, and the rest of the freight was taken away in barges. The ship, rudderless nd otherwise disabled, was pulled off the shoals nd towed into port for repairs. The place where he ship ran aground is one of the most dangerous on the Atlantic coast, and ships require especial precautions in approaching it. The promptness nd heroism manifested by the rescuers is a just cause of pride to every American. There are fearful spiritual storms that throw souls upon the rocks nd sands. There are many faithful ones who rush to the rescue of those thus shipwrecked. The fortunate saving of those on the Turrialba suggests he escape of those with Paul in his shipwreck.

And so it came to pass, that they escaped all safe to land. Acts 27: 44.)

Subway Passenger Record Broken

ALL records on subway traffic were broken the other Monday, when 1,208,626 passengers were carried in the New York subways on that day. The previous high record was on October 14 last, during the review of the American warships in the North River. On that day 1,199,747 passengers were carried. The next highest number conveyed was 1,179,512 during the Hudson-Fulton celebration in September, 1909. With this vast facility for handling the public, New York City has just closed contracts for scores of miles of new subways, at a cost of hundreds of millions of dollars. Migration is one of the factors of enlightenment, of civilization. So the prophet says:

Many shall run to and fro, and knowledge shall be increased. (Dan. 12: 4.)

Wanted to Be Beautiful

A YOUNG lady in Brooklyn, of good character and name, noticed some wrinkles in her face which somewhat marred a comely countenance. A friend told her that bichloride of mercury taken in small doses would remove the wrinkles and made her features and complexion more beautiful. She followed the advice, and the poison killed her. The coroner is investigating the case, and is in search of the friend who recommended the alleged beautifier. We have no idea that the person recommended the chemical, anticipating any danger, or that the victim looked for anything but a beneficial result from its use. There are young ladies of good families and right intention, whose vanity leads them to arts for the improvement of the beauty of the features and dress, which are dangerous to health and to morals. Real beauty lies in behind the physical features. This beauty of spiritual feature Stephen had before the council:

And they saw his face as it had been the face of an angel. (Acts 6: 15.)

The Fruit and Passenger Laden Steamer "Turrialba" on the Sands Just off the Atlantic Coast at Barnegat, N. J.

Saved Others, Lost Himself

THE ice broke on Crotona Park Lake, New York City, and four persons were drowning. An excavalryman of the United States service named Berger went to them; the ice broke, letting him into the water. He brought one to safety, then another, and in trying to save the third, the boy caught him around the neck and held him under till both were drowned. Berger's name is not on the calling list of fashionable society, nor in the pages of newspapers, but he was a real hero, and a martyr, imitating his Master, of whom it was said:

He saved others; himself he cannot save. (Matt. 27: 42.)

Seals Protected by Law

IN 1911 the United States, Great Britain, Russia and Japan made a treaty to stop the wanton slaughter of seals in the North Pacific. The treaty was supplemented last August by an act of Congress. No more seals are to be killed for five years, except the young males on land for food. The United States owns most of the seals and has since 1867, when the Pribiloff Islands were ceded to it by Russia, but neither sense or humanity has marked the killing. When the mother seal has been out for a swim, getting food for her young left in safety on an island, she has been killed recklessly, and her offspring have perished with starvation. The average woman of the country is deeply interested in the reduction of the cost of living, in groceries, produce, dry goods, clothing, etc. Only a few comparatively will be concerned in the price of sealskin sacks. Those who are will be likely to have to pay more for this kind of furs than heretofore, as the supply will be virtually cut off for five years, unless it should be that fashion would in the meantime relegate the sealskin garment to the cedar chest and designate something else to take its place. Wearing the skins of animals as clothing was a primitive custom thus referred to:

Unto Adam also and to his wife did the Lord God make coats of skins, and clothed them. (Gen. 3: 21.)

Young Rockefeller's Prayers Answered

JOHN D. ROCKEFELLER, Jr., made a New Year's address the afternoon of the last Sunday of the year at the beautiful Y. M. C. A. building in Tarrytown, N. Y., which voiced the strongest faith in prayer, and inspired the highest and holiest ambitions in young men for the new year. The speaker gave this significant personal experience: "There came a time in my life when I met with a grave crisis. My happiness and usefulness in this world depended on the decision. I prayed every night for four years. One morning before the sun arose—before dawn had broken—I awoke and felt just as sure of which road to take as if there had been a big sign to guide me. I was so sure that I got up from bed, lighted a lamp and wrote a letter committing myself to that course. No man can prove to me that there is nothing in prayer after my experience. God answered me. And there is not a man present whom he will not answer if that man asks sincerely. I say to you young men that there is nothing you cannot achieve if you pray to God for help. But if you pray, you must be willing to abide by the answer." Mr. Rockefeller continued his remarks to the boys, based on Paul's question: "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" and closed with this touching tribute to his mother and the Bible: "This worn-out Bible I hold in my hand was given to me by my mother thirty years ago. I cherish this Bible as I do nothing else in the world. I prize it because it tells me that my mother is praying night and morning for her boy. I think I have the best mother that ever lived. Doubtless each of you thinks that your mother is the best. I hope you do. Always think of your mother, and she will keep you from doing anything wrong and she will inspire you to do things that are great and noble. The new year is upon us. The book is made up of clean sheets only. There is not a mark on any of its pages. See to it that your books contain nothing but good marks this year. Find out what is right to do, and then pray; pray to God for the courage to make you do what is right. Your prayers will be answered." Sons of rich men are often lazy, trifling, intemperate and dissolute wrecks and mockeries, made so by the indolence and social temptations incident to the luxury of wealth. Very many sons of the rich, however, overcome the handicaps of their environment and become our leading professional and business men, and true specimens of a Christian manhood. The beautiful tribute of this son to his Christian mother and to God's Word and his implicit faith in the answer to prayer takes us into the presence of our Elder Brother, who knows no difference between the rich and the poor, the high and the low, the learned and the unlearned, who bids all to come in sweet fellowship to the foot of his cross, and to a life consecrated to his service of love, and gives this commandment to them with a blessed promise.

Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you. (Matt. 7: 7.)

THE SPIRIT OF CAIN*

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

WHENEVER we have a Bible lesson to study, it will help very much the interest of it if we know whether Jesus ever said anything about it. This we can always discover by turning to the lesson in the Red Letter Bible. If referred to by Jesus, we shall find it printed in red, and in the margins we shall find indicated where in the Gospels we can read what Jesus said about it. Take, for example, this lesson about Cain and Abel. The sad story is printed in red, showing that Jesus did refer to it, and in the margins we see noted Matt. 23: 35 and Luke 11: 51. We turn to the Gospels and read the verses indicated. We read in Matthew that Jesus was uttering a denunciation of the Scribes and Pharisees, and he rebuked the Cainlike spirit which was in them, and pronounced them guilty of all righteous blood shed upon the earth from the time of Abel. And in Luke's Gospel we read very much the same: "From the blood of Abel," etc. Cain was a brother, but he lacked the brotherly spirit; ay, worse, he had instead the spirit of a murderer. Cain was envious of his brother Abel. Abel had found favor with God, and Cain had not. This was shown when God accepted the sacrifice of a lamb by Abel, and would not receive the grain and fruits offered by Cain. Abel's sacrifice typified Jesus, the Lamb of God, slain from the foundation of the world, and we must believe that he had received instructions from his father Adam about the Redeemer promised on the occasion of his sin in the Garden of Eden. Certainly Cain had received similar instruction, but he ignored it, and made only an offering which in effect said: "I thank thee," when he should also have offered a sacrifice of a lamb, which would have been the same as saying: "I have sinned." Cain envied his brother Abel the favor of God, and envy quickly led to hatred, and hatred to murder. So Cain became the first murderer, a distinction that made him not only famous but infamous. Then God himself asked the question: "Where is Abel thy brother?" Cain answered the question by the impudent query: "Am I my brother's keeper?" Then God showed himself to be the Avenger of the innocent, and he pronounced sentence upon Cain: that he should be a fugitive and a wanderer upon the earth; he was to be henceforth a brother to no man, and to be identified with those whose hand is against every man. "My punishment is greater than I can bear" was the response of Cain. Then God gave him assurance that his own life should not be taken, and God sealed this promise with a sign upon Cain.

We can not unfold our newspapers without seeing that the spirit of Cain is abroad in the land. On every page and in almost every column we find accounts of murders, thefts, suicides, bribe-takings, divorces, kidnappings, etc., that can but make us feel that Cain has many descendants even in this twentieth century, and their tribe is ever increasing! The Cainlike spirit exists among nations as well as among individuals, but if this spirit was not in individuals, it would not be in the nations.

Brotherhood was a failure in the family of Adam, and it has been a failure in many families since then. Men did not learn the true meaning of brotherhood until the coming of Jesus Christ, "of whom the whole family in heaven and earth is named" (Eph. 3: 15)—the Christian family. What did the first brothers do in that family? John and Andrew were the first disciples of Jesus, and when they had been sitting one day at the feet of Jesus, learning of him, they left Jesus for a time to go and find their brothers that they might bring them into the same sweet communion. Andrew found his own brother Simon, and John found James. So it has been ever since—the Christly man is unselfish, and thinks first what he can do for his own brothers; and then all men become his brothers—those in the town where he lives; in the same nation; in all nations.

THE FIRST DEATH

From the painting by W. A. Bougereau

The whole world is thus brought into kinship through Christ. Not only does the Christ spirit make brothers of all men, but it has truly been said: "Every relation sustained by one human being to another feels the inspiring touch of the love of Christ. It strengthens the bond between husband and wife; it sweetens the tie between parent and child till the earthly home savors of heaven; it welds the hearts of kindred till all family burdens and sorrows are kindly adjusted to the strength of each; it kindles the flame of neighborly regard, and beautifies the community and creates sympathies and activities which relieve the asperities of a world of sin." By nature we all belong to the family of Adam, and we are quite prone to be Cainlike. Let us seek for a speedy adoption into the Christian family where we may live under the sway of loving-kindness.

Social welfare is a new phrase formed to describe all sorts of enterprises that are being set forth to make the conditions of life more conducive to the moral and physical well-being of all classes of people. This indicates a quickened conscience about being our "brother's keeper." It is just the oppos of the Cain-spirit. The social welfare movem finds expression in such things as safety applian in machine shops and factories; safeguards mines; child labor organizations for the protect of children; out-door sanitariums for the cure tuberculous patients; roof-top schools for childi of the poor afflicted with tuberculosis; plans better housing of the poor; "swat-the-fly" crusad that reduce greatly the ravages of typhoid fe and infantile paralysis; the destruction of m quitoes, that has largely done away with yell fever and malarial diseases; hygienic and den graphic congresses, which present in a popular w plans for sanitation and healthy living conditio publication of hints as to diet and values of foo so that all people may know how to eat sanely a safely—getting the most go out of their food; the constr tion of better roads and t introduction of the telepho system and postal facilities rural districts, which bring farmers and other country re dents many of the advantag of the town or city. These mu all be counted as belonging social welfare. They are t appreciation of the Christ-spir not found in heathen lands u less adopted from Christi lands. Dr. Graham Taylor the Survey says: "That religi and society, the church and t community have values to e change becomes clearer in t consciousness of those worki for each. Indeed, it becom more and more evident that wo truly done for one serves t other. Though not identical aim, the church and the comm nity can not be separated. the community fails, the chur can not succeed. If the chur fails, the community is not su cessful."

"Have you any seeds of kin ness for sale?" a little bo asked at a seed store.

"Seeds of kindness? Wha are they?" asked the seedsma

"I have a little garden, and want to plant some kindnes seeds," replied the boy.

"Oh, they come in a mixe package," said the seedsman, a he took a big book from the shelf.

"That looks like a Bible," the boy thought, an sure enough it was.

"Let me see; I think I shall find that passage i the first chapter of II. Peter," said the man. "Ye there it is. See if you can read it for me, beginnin with the fifth verse." So the boy read: "And beside this, giving all diligence, add to your faith, virtue and to virtue, knowledge; and to knowledge, tem perance; and to temperance, patience; and to pa tience, godliness; and to godliness, brotherly kind ness; and to brotherly kindness, charity."

"Eight kinds of seeds in this package, you see, said the man. "But aren't there any real seeds? asked the boy. "Does it mean that you are just t be kind to folks?" "Yes, that is what it means, replied the man, "but charity and kindness an faith are real things; and if you plant them in you heart, they will live and grow just as seeds grov in the garden." "I shall find that package o mixed seeds in my Bible when I get home," said th boy, "and it may help me to be kind all of th time."

OUR SUNDAY SCHOOL SUPERINTENDENTS' ROUND TABLE

"I AM A READER of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and have been greatly interested and helped by questions and suggestions offered in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD concerning Sunday school superintendents and their work. I am superintendent of a Sunday school where we have a membership of about 155 with an attendance averaging 110. I wish that I could get suggestions as to keeping up the interest in Sunday school work and the conducting of the hour, or that part of the hour, allotted to me. I am new at the work, having been in active church work only about ten months, but am ambitious to do the work with credit and profit to God. I find the most of my trouble is, or at least I seem to feel, that my part of the service has the sameness that becomes stale to the not over-interested scholar." Yes, "sameness" monotony will kill a Sunday school or any other enterprise. It is dry rot; in such a case rut and rot become synonymous. This does not signify that there should be a complete change in the program every Sunday. Let the superintendent be a close observer, and at the first symptom of a loss of interest, which is usually inattention or restlessness, let a change be made in the program. Suggestions as to how this may be done are as follows: Instead of the usual "opening hymn," have a song service of ten or fifteen minutes, in which selections made by scholars are sung. Improve the singing by having different sections sing two or three lines of the same verse, the whole school joining in the chorus. Endeavor to organize a Sunday school orchestra, which shall play occasionally. Instead of always reading the lesson himself, let the superintendent call on a teacher to do it, or ask a whole class to stand and read it in concert. Let the superintendent sometimes have a preview instead of a review of the lesson. By so doing he will open up the lesson for study, rather than give closing thoughts. Do not weary scholars with many "announcements." Sometimes have these written on the blackboard to be read aloud by the school in concert. Appoint special days as Parents' Sunday, Home Department Sunday, Rally Day, Decision Day, with exercises appropriate to each. It is plain to be seen that a superintendent should arrange his program before coming to the school, and have it written out, by typewriter if possible. And he should come early, at least fifteen minutes before the opening of the session; half an hour would be better. The time can well be spent in looking after details, seeing that everything is in running order. One superintendent of a school of three hundred took his place near the entrance door, and had the scholars file by him as they came in, each one speaking his or her name. The superintendent turned to each name in an indexed class book (indexed along the edges, such a book as one may purchase for twenty-five cents), and as he marked the attendance he had a moment for the consideration of each scholar, when a kind word was spoken, or an inquiry made. As a consequence, he became personally acquainted with all of his scholars. The attendance of late comers was marked by an assistant who took the superintendent's place. Sunday School Problems, by Amos R. Wells, is a book that will arouse and help all Sunday school superintendents. Who will be the next superintendent to ask questions, or send some practical plans for the help of other superintendents? Help and be helped.

POLLYANNA

BY ELEANOR H. PORTER

Author of "The Story of Marco," "Into Still Waters," "The Transformation of Margaret," etc.

A SERIAL STORY. ILLUSTRATED BY M. STOCKTON MULFORD

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

Pollyanna, eleven years old, comes East to live with her aunt, Miss Polly Harrington, of Beldingsville, Vt. Miss Harrington is a lady of most unlovely and ungenerous character, though she believes herself to be a very good woman, and tries vigorously to do in every case what she believes to be her duty. She has consented to receive Pollyanna at the request of the Ladies' Aid Society of the mission church in the West of which the child's father had been pastor. Her mother, Miss Polly's sister, had died some years earlier, her father but recently. The young wife had never received her family's forgiveness for marrying the poor minister. But now Miss Harrington consents to receive the little girl and directs her servant Nancy to prepare a small attic room for her. She wishes to put her at a distance from her own apartments and avoid the risk of her marring the valuable furnishings of any other room. Nancy is sent to the station to meet Pollyanna. From every fresh disappointment she rallies amazingly, always finding something to be glad about. She explains that this is a game which her father had taught her and played with her. Nancy agrees to try to play the game, too. Pollyanna takes jelly to Mrs. Snow, a fault-finding invalid, and wheedles her into having her hair dressed and her curtains raised. After a number of visits Mrs. Snow herself begins to play the game. Pollyanna also meets a mysterious silent Man, who is, she learns later, Mr. John Pendleton, a rich and rather sour recluse, and after a number of one-sided salutations makes him talk to her. Aunt Polly at last has Pollyanna moved to a larger and more beautiful room. After she has surprised her aunt into adopting a stray dog and cat, she finds a homeless boy, and brings him in, confident that Miss Polly will keep him. She is disappointed in this, however, her aunt resolutely resisting the strange influence the little girl has already begun to have upon her. Nothing daunted, Pollyanna takes the boy's case to the Ladies' Aid Society of the Beldingsville church, but here, too, meets with disappointment. Returning through the woods she finds Mr. John Pendleton, who has fallen and broken his leg. He sends Pollyanna to his house, a big, silent and terrifying edifice, to telephone for Dr. Chilton to come with men and a stretcher. Pollyanna performs her errand with amazing alacrity, returning to hold his head on her lap till the doctor comes. Pollyanna takes jelly also to Mr. Pendleton, and begins to sense mysteries. Both Dr. Chilton and Mr. Pendleton appear to have had a special interest in Miss Polly, the thought of this seems to irritate her. Pollyanna continues to pay occasional visits to John Pendleton, and they become fast friends. Pollyanna and romantically-inclined Nancy conclude that Miss Polly and Mr. Pendleton had once been lovers, and Pollyanna decides to try to bring them together again. During a late August call at Mr. Pendleton's, Pollyanna's attention is attracted by a reflected rainbow. To her great delight Mr. Pendleton has a maid bring an old-fashioned candlestick, the prisms from which, when hung in the window, fill the room with dancing color. This suggests to Pollyanna that the sun himself is trying to play her game. Mr. Pendleton hears the story of the game from the first—"from the crutches that should have been a doll." Mr. Pendleton tells Pollyanna that she herself is a living prism.

CHAPTER XVI

SOMEWHAT SURPRISING

POLLYANNA entered school in September. School, in some ways, was a surprise to her, but she enjoyed it. In spite of her delight in her new work, Pollyanna did not forget her old friends, though she could not give them much time now. Perhaps John Pendleton was the most dissatisfied.

One Saturday afternoon he spoke to her about it.

"See here, Pollyanna, how would you like to come and live with me?" he asked, a little impatiently. "I don't see anything of you nowadays."

Pollyanna laughed—Mr. Pendleton was such a funny man!

"I thought you didn't like to have folks round," she said.

He made a wry face.

"Oh, but that was before you taught me to play that wonderful game of yours. Now I'm glad to be waited on, hand and foot!"

"Oh, but you aren't really glad at all for things. You just say so," pouted Pollyanna. "You know you don't play the game right ever, Mr. Pendleton—you know you don't!"

The man's face grew suddenly very grave.

"That's why I want you, little girl, to help me play it. Will you come?"

Pollyanna turned in surprise.

"Mr. Pendleton, you don't really mean—that?"

"But I do. I want you. Will you come?"

Pollyanna looked distressed.

"Why, Mr. Pendleton, I can't—you know I can't. Why, I'm—Aunt Polly's!"

A quick something crossed the man's face that Pollyanna could not quite understand. His head came up almost fiercely.

"You're no more hers than—perhaps she would let you come to me," he finished more gently. "Would you come—if she did?"

Pollyanna frowned in deep thought.

"But Aunt Polly has been so good to me," she began slowly; "and she took me when I didn't have anybody left but the Ladies' Aid, and—"

"But I do. I want you. Will you come?"

Again that spasm of something crossed the man's face; but this time, when he spoke, his voice was low and very sad.

"Pollyanna, long years ago I loved somebody very much. I hoped to bring her, some day, to this house. But—well, I didn't bring her here. Never mind why. I just didn't—that's all. And ever since then this great gray pile of stone has been a house—never a home. It takes a woman's hand and heart, or a child's presence, to make a home, Pollyanna; and I have not had either. Now will you come, my dear?"

Pollyanna sprang to her feet. Her face was fairly illumined.

"Mr. Pendleton—you—you mean that you wish you—you had had that woman's hand and heart all this time?"

"Why, y-yes, Pollyanna."

"Oh, I'm so glad! Then it's all right," sighed the little girl. "Now you can take us both—and everything will be lovely."

"Take—you—both?" repeated the man, dazedly.

A faint doubt crossed Pollyanna's countenance.

"Well, of course, Aunt Polly isn't won over, yet; but I'm sure she will be if you tell it to her just as you did to me, and then we'd both come, of course."

A look of actual terror leaped to the man's eyes.

"Aunt Polly come—here!" he cried.

Pollyanna's eyes widened a little.

"Would you rather go there?" she asked. "Of course the house isn't quite so pretty, but it's nearer—"

"Pollyanna, what are you talking about?" asked the man, very gently now.

"Why, about where we're going to live, of course," rejoined Pollyanna, in obvious surprise. "I thought you meant here, at first. You said it was here that you had wanted Aunt Polly's hand and heart all these years to make a home, and—"

An inarticulate cry came from the man's throat. He raised his hand and began to speak; but the next moment he dropped it nervelessly at his side.

"The doctor, sir," said the maid in the doorway.

Pollyanna rose at once.

John Pendleton turned to her feverishly.

"Pollyanna, for heaven's sake, say nothing of what I asked you—yet," he begged in a low voice.

Pollyanna dimpled into a sunny smile.

"Of course not! Just as if I didn't know you'd rather tell her yourself!" she called back merrily over her shoulder.

John Pendleton fell limply back in his chair.

"Why, what's up?" demanded the doctor, a minute later, his fingers on his patient's galloping pulse.

A whimsical smile curved John Pendleton's lips.

"Overdose of your—tonic, I guess," he laughed, as he noted the doctor's eyes following Pollyanna's little figure down the driveway.

CHAPTER XVII

WHICH IS MORE SURPRISING

ON THE way home from Sunday school the next morning Dr. Chilton overtook Pollyanna, and brought his horse to a stop.

"Suppose you let me drive you home, Pollyanna," he suggested. "I was just driving out to your place to tell you," he went on as Pollyanna settled herself at his side. "Mr. Pendleton sent a special request for you to go to see him this afternoon, sure. He says it's very important."

Pollyanna nodded happily.

"Yes it is, I know. I'll go."

The doctor eyed her with some surprise. "I'm not sure I shall let you go, after all," he declared, his eyes twinkling. "You seemed more upsetting than soothing yesterday, young lady."

Pollyanna laughed.

"Oh, it wasn't me, truly—not so much as it was Aunt Polly."

The doctor turned with a start.

"Your aunt!" he ejaculated.

Pollyanna gave a happy little bounce in her seat.

"Yes. And it's so exciting and lovely, just like a story, you know. I—I'm going to tell you," she burst out, with sudden decision. "He said not to mention it; but he wouldn't mind your knowing, of course. He meant not to mention it to her."

"Her?"

"Yes; Aunt Polly. And, of course, he would

THE FATE OF THE DYNAMITERS

ON OCTOBER 1, 1910, the Los Angeles Times building in that city was blown up by means of a dynamite bomb, the lives of twenty-one persons being sacrificed.

On December 1, 1911, James B. McNamara pleaded guilty at Los Angeles to having placed the bomb where it accomplished its deadly work, and John J. McNamara, secretary of the International Association of Bridge and Structural Iron Workers, pleaded guilty to having dynamited the Llewellyn Iron Works in the same city on Christmas Day, 1910. Four days later the first named was sentenced to life imprisonment, and the second to imprisonment for fifteen years.

On December 28, 1912, at Indianapolis, after a trial lasting more than three months, and on which the government alone is said to have spent over $750,000, the jury returned a verdict of "guilty" against all but two of the labor union officials who had been charged in an indictment of fifty-two counts with conspiracy to violate Federal laws and aiding in the illegal transportation of dynamite and nitroglycerine on passenger trains.

Many of those convicted were charged with knowing of local explosions on the construction operations by contractors who refused to recognize the union. Ryan, Butler, Clancy, Webb, Young, Cooley, Legleitner and Beum were, however, convicted as having appropriated $1,000 a month out of the funds of the union, the amount being expended by John J. McNamara for explosions. One of the most prominent of the defendants was Herbert S. Hockin, who only resigned as secretary of the union a few weeks ago, and was called "the Iago of the conspiracy," because he helped to instigate the plots, employed Ortie McManigal to carry them out, and afterwards betrayed his fellow conspirators to promote his own interests.

On Monday, December 30, Judge Albert B. Anderson announced the sentences of the convicted men.

Judge Anderson's efforts to give them every possible chance under the law, and his attitude of mercy in the passing of sentences, made one of the most notable features of the final session in the case, when thirty-three were sentenced to terms in the Federal prison at Leavenworth, Kan., and six received suspension of sentence.

The tense and almost tragic aspect of the court proceedings, which were punctuated at intervals by the sobs of women and children, were relieved by the judge's exhibition of clemency and by his grim epigram that "government by injunction is infinitely to be preferred to government by dynamite."

United States Marshal Schmidt and the Superintendent of Police of Indianapolis Leading the Long Line of Condemned Dynamiters to Jail

As the head of the union whose strike was given as the motive for promoting the dynamite plots, Frank M. Ryan was sentenced to seven years' imprisonment, the heaviest sentence of all. He is the president of the Ironworkers' International Union. Sentences of six years were awarded to John T. Butler, Buffalo, vice-president; Eugene A. Clancy, San Francisco; Herbert S. Hockin, ex-secretary, formerly of Detroit; Michael J. Young, Boston; John E. Munsey, Salt Lake City; Olaf A. Tveitmoe, San Francisco, secretary of the California Building Trades Council; Philip A. Cooley, New Orleans; and Frank C. Webb, New York; Jo H. Barry, St. Louis, and Peter J. Smith, Cle land, were sentenced to four-year terms; a Charles N. Beum, Minneapolis; Edward Smyt Peoria, Ill.; Murray L. Pennell, Springfield, I Henry W. Legleitner, Denver; Ernest G. Basey, Indianapolis; George Anderson, Clevela William E. Reddin, Milwaukee; Paul J. Morrin, Louis; Michael J. Hannon, Scranton, Pa.; Willi J. McCain, Kansas City; Wilford Bert Brown, Ka sas City, Mo., and Michael Cunnane, Philadelphia, ceived three-year sentence

Two-year sentences we awarded to Richard H. Ho lihan, Chicago; Frank Higgins, Boston; Frank Painter, Omaha; and Fr Sherman, Indianapolis; a one year and one day James E. Ray, Peoria, Il William Shupe, Chicag William C. Bernhardt, Ci cinnati; Edward E. Phillip Syracuse; Charles Wach meister, Detroit; and Fr Mooney, Duluth, Minn.

The following convicte men were released under su pended sentences: Patrick Farrell, New York; Jam Cooney, Chicago; Hiram Kline, Muncie, Ind.; Frank Murphy, Detroit; Edwar Clark, Cincinnati; Jam Coughlin, Chicago.

Sentences of a year and day were imposed so that th prisoners might be taken to Federal prison instead of be ing confined in county jails.

These sentences close wha may be termed a seve years' conflict between trade unions and employers wh stood for "the open shop," for although th explosion of the Los Angeles Times building wa the most disastrous of the violent deeds per formed by those now suffering for their participation in them, it was by no means the first. In 1905 four of these outrages took place; in 1906, 12; in 1907, 6; in 1908, 29; in 1909, 22; and in 1910, 29 In 1911 there were eleven more.

Two days after the pronouncement of the sentences, Judge Anderson granted a writ of error to the condemned men, for whom a request for a writ of supersedeas will be addressed to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals.

want to tell her himself instead of having me do it—lovers, so!"

"Lovers!" As the doctor said the word, the horse started violently, as if the hand that held the reins had given them a sharp jerk.

"Yes," nodded Pollyanna, happily. "That's the story part, you see. I didn't know it till Nancy told me. She said Aunt Polly had a lover years ago, and they quarreled. She didn't know who it was at first. But we've found out now. It's Mr. Pendleton, you know."

The doctor relaxed suddenly. The hand holding the reins fell limply to his lap.

"Oh! No; I—didn't know," he said quietly.

Pollyanna hurried on; they were nearing the Harrington homestead.

"Yes; and I'm so glad now. It's come out lovely. Mr. Pendleton told me all about the woman's hand and heart that he used to want, and I found out that he wanted it now; and I was so glad! For, of course, if he wants to make up the quarrel, everything will be all right now, and Aunt Polly and I will both go to live there, or else he'll come to live with us. Of course Aunt Polly doesn't know yet, and we haven't got everything settled; so I suppose that is why he wanted to see me this afternoon, sure."

The doctor sat suddenly erect. There was an odd smile on his lips.

"Yes; I can well imagine that Mr. John Pendleton does want to see you, Pollyanna," he nodded, as he pulled his horse to a stop before the door.

Pollyanna found a very nervous John Pendleton waiting for her that afternoon.

"Pollyanna," he began at once, "I've been trying all night to puzzle out what you meant by all that, yesterday—about my wanting your Aunt Polly's h-hand and heart all these years. What did you mean?"

"Why, because you were lovers, you know—once; and I was so glad you still felt that way now."

"Lovers! your Aunt Polly and I?"

"Why, Mr. Pendleton, Nancy said you were!"

The man gave a short little laugh.

"Indeed! Well, I'm afraid—that Nancy—didn't know."

"Then you—weren't lovers?" Pollyanna's voice was tragic with dismay.

"Never!"

"And it isn't all coming out like a book?"

There was no answer.

"Oh, dear! And it was all going so splendidly!" almost sobbed Pollyanna. "I'd been so glad to come—with Aunt Polly."

"And you won't—now?" The man asked the question without turning his head.

"Of course not! I'm Aunt Polly's."

The man turned now, almost fiercely.

"Before you were hers, Pollyanna, you were—your mother's. And—it was your mother's hand and heart that I wanted long years ago."

"My mother's!"

"Yes. I had not meant to tell you, but perhaps it's better, after all, that I do—now." John Pendleton's face had grown very white. He was speaking with evident difficulty. "I loved your mother; but she—didn't love me. And after a time she went away with—your father. I did not know until then how much I did—care. The whole world seemed suddenly to turn black under my fingers, and— But never mind that. For long years I have been a cross, crabbed, unlovable, unloved old man—though I'm not nearly fifty yet, Pollyanna. Then, one day, like one of the prisms that you love so well, little girl, you danced into my life, and flecked my dreary old world with dashes of the purple and gold and scarlet of your own bright cheeriness. I found out, after a time, who you were; and—and I thought then I never wanted to see you again. I didn't want to be reminded. But—you know how that came out. And now I want you always. Pollyanna, won't you come—now?"

"But, Mr. Pendleton, I—there's Aunt Polly!" Pollyanna's eyes were blurred with tears.

He made an impatient gesture.

"What about me? How do you suppose I'm going to be 'glad' about anything—without you? Why, Pollyanna, it's only since you came that I've been even half glad to live! But if I had you for my little girl, I'd be glad for—everything. And, as for you—I'd try to make you 'glad,' too, my dear. You shouldn't have a wish ungratified. All my money, to the last cent, should go to make you happy. I need you, little girl," he added, his voice softening into tender pleading once more. "If ever, ever I am to play the 'glad game', Pollyanna, you'll have to come and play it with me."

The little girl's forehead puckered into a wistful frown.

"Aunt Polly has been so good to me—" she began; but the man interrupted her sharply.

"Of course she's been good to you! But she doesn't want you, I'll warrant, half so much as I do," he contested.

"Why, Mr. Pendleton, she's glad, I know, to have—"

"Glad!" interrupted the man, thoroughly losing his patience now. "I'll wager Miss Polly doesn't know how to be glad—for anything! Oh, she does her duty, I know. She's a very dutiful woman. I've had experience with her 'duty' before. I'll acknowledge we haven't been the best of friends for the last fifteen years or so. But I know her; and she isn't the 'glad' kind, Pollyanna. She doesn't know how to be. As for your coming to me—you just ask her and see if she

DAILY MEDITATION
FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR
BY REV. J. H. JOWETT, D. D.

WEDNESDAY, January 15. James 1: 12-20. Evil enticements always come to us in borrowed attire. In the Boer War ammunition was carried in piano cases, and military advices were transmitted in the skins of melons. And that is the way of the enemy of our souls. He makes us think we are receiving music when he is sending explosives: he promises life but his gift is laden with the seeds of death. He offers us liberty, and he hides his chains in dazzling flowers. "Things are not what they seem."

And so our enemy uses mirages and will-o'-the-wisps and tinseled crowns. He lights beacon-fires on perilous coasts to snare us to our ruin. And therefore we need clear, sure eyes. We need a refined moral sense which can discriminate between the true and the false, and which can discern the enemy even when he comes as "an angel of light." And we may have this wisdom from "the God of all wisdom." By his grace we may be kept morally sensitive, and we shall know our foe even when he is a long way off.

THURSDAY, January 16. Psalm 139: 1-12—"Thou knowest my thought afar off." That fills me with awe. I cannot find a hiding-place where I can sin in secrecy. I cannot build an apparent sanctuary and conceal evil within its walls. I cannot with a sheep's skin hide the wolf. I cannot wrap my jealousy up in flattery and keep it unknown. "Thou God seest me." He knows the bottom thought that creeps in the basement of my being. Nothing surprises God! He sees all my sin. So am I filled with awe.

"Thou knowest my thought afar off." This fills me also with hope and joy. He sees the faintest, weakest desire aspiring after goodness. He sees the smallest fire of affection burning uncertainly in my soul. He sees every movement of penitence which looks toward home. He sees every little triumph, and every altar I build along life's way. Nothing is overlooked. My God is not like a policeman, only looking for crimes; he is the God of grace, looking for graces, searching for jewels to adorn his crown. So am I filled with hope and joy.

FRIDAY, January 17. I. John 3: 4-10. Sin is transgression. It is the deliberate climbing of the fence. We see the trespassboard, and in spite of the warning we stride into the forbidden field. Sin is not ignorance, it is intention. We sin when we are wide-awake! There are teachers abroad who would soften words like these. They offer us terms which appear to lessen the harshness of our actions; they give our sin an aspect of innocence. But to alter the label on the bottle does not change the character of the contents. Poison is poison, give it what name we please. "Sin is the transgression of the law."

Let us be on our guard against the men whose pockets are filled with deceptive labels. Let us vigilantly resist all teachings which would chloroform the conscience. Let us prefer true terms to merely nice ones. Let us call sin by its right name, and let us tolerate no moral conjuring either with ourselves or with others. The first essential in all moral reformation is to call sin "sin." "If we confess our sin He is faithful and just to forgive us our sin."

SATURDAY, January 18. Romans 5: 12-21. When old Mr. Honest came to the river, and he entered the cold waters of death, the last words he was heard to utter by those who stood on the shore were these: "Grace reigns!" All through his pilgrimage old Mr. Honest had been in Emmanuel's Land, where grace reigned night and day. It was "through grace" that he had found the way of life. It was through grace that he had been delivered from the beasts and pitfalls of the road. It was grace that had given him lilies of peace, and springs of refreshment, and the fine air that inspired him in difficult tasks. And in death he still found "grace abounding," and the Lord of the changing road was also Lord of the dark waters through which he passed into the radiant glories of the cloudless day.

In every yard of a faithful pilgrimage we shall find the decrees of sovereign love. We are never in alien country. "Grace reigns" in every hill and valley, through every green pasture and every rugged road, in every moment of "the day of life," and in the last sharp passage through the transient night of death.

SUNDAY, January 19. Revelation 22: 1-14. The Bible opens with a garden. The first is the Paradise that was lost. The last is Paradise regained. And between the two there is a third garden, the garden of Gethsemane.

And it is through the unspeakable bitterness and desolation of Gethsemane that we find again the glorious garden through which flows "the river of water of life." Without Gethsemane no New Jerusalem! Without its mysterious and unfathomable night no blessed sunrise of eternal hope! "We were reconciled to God by the death of his Son."

We are always in dire peril of regarding our redemption lightly. We hold it cheaply. Privileges come to be easily esteemed as rights. And even grace itself can lose the strength of heavenly favor and can be received and used as our due. "Gethsemane can I forget?" Yes, I can; and in the forgetfulness I lose the sacred awe of my redemption, and I miss the real glory of "Paradise regained." "Ye are not your own: ye are bought with a price." That is the remembrance that keeps the spirit lowly, and that fills the heart with love for him "whose I am, and whom I ought to serve."

MONDAY, January 20. Genesis 4: 3-15. Cain and Abel each brought an offering unto the Lord, but one was accepted and the other rejected. It is the giver who determines the worth or the worthlessness of the gift. God looks not at the gift, but at the hand that brings it. "Your hands are full of blood!" "Your hands are unclean!" The Lord demands "clean hands." He will not have our compliments if there is defilement behind them. Our courtesies are rejected if iniquity attends them. The shining gloss on the linen is an offense if the dirt looks through! Who cares for food if

A POET OF THE PEOPLE

WILL CARLETON, the genial poet of home life, passed away in Brooklyn on the evening of December 18, in his sixty-eighth year. Perhaps no literary man of his time was so beloved by the common people as was Carleton. He touched responsive chords in their souls and played upon their emotions with a homely genius that was all his own. His words, simple, forceful, appealing, thrilled their hearts, went straight to the fountain-springs of their nature, aroused their finest sympathies, evoked their tenderest sentiments and made their whole feelings tingle and vibrate with the mastery of his charm.

This man understood the common people because he was of them. He was born at Hudson, Mich., October 21, 1845, and worked on a farm much of the time while he was getting his early schooling. While working hard he studied hard and was able to teach the district school at sixteen. Like Burns, the Ayrshire plowman, the mantle of the gods fell upon him in the fields, the Muses whispered in his ears, and his soul burst forth in song—not the song of the mystics and dreamers, but simple words of simple ballads which expressed the joys and sorrows, the hopes and fears, in short, the everyday existence of those by whom he was surrounded and to whom his heart went out in the fulness of natural sympathy. From first to last he strung his lute to homey themes and never got away nor tried to get away from the first affections which gave inspiration to his verse.

Though he had written much previously, his first great success was made in 1871 when "Betsy and I Are Out" was published in the Toledo Blade. This heralded his name from one end of the country to the other, as nearly all the papers of the time copied it. The poem commemorates the domestic disputes of a simple old farmer and his wife, who have agreed to disagree on most subjects. While the humor is infectious, unconsciously appealing to the risibilities of the reader, there is, at the same time, an undercurrent of genuine pathos which causes the well-springs of the feelings to surge up, and we find ourselves sympathizing as much with Betsy as does the old man himself. A difference in creed, as is too often the case, seems to be the first cause of dissension:

First thing I remember whereon we disagreed
Was something concerning heaven—a difference in our creed;
We arg'ed the thing at breakfast, we arg'ed the thing at tea,
And the more we arg'ed the question, the more we didn't agree.

It is somewhat consoling to learn from another poem, "How Betsy and I Made Up," that all differences are adjusted, the old feeling for each other returns and harmony, except for an odd "word or two," prevails once more in the household:

Since then I don't deny but we've had a word or two;
But we've got our eyes wide open now, and know just what to do:
When one speaks cross the other just meets it with a laugh,
And the first one's ready to give up considerable more than half.

The conclusion of the old man should certainly assuage Betsy for the little disagreements of the past and make the venerable lady feel elated at the high valuation of her spouse:

I'm richer than a National Bank with all its treasures told;
For I've got a wife at home now that's worth her weight in gold.

Indeed, it may be said that a tender, artless pathos is a distinguishing characteristic in nearly all Carleton's writings. Some of his pieces are intensely pathetic, exhibiting those deep feelings of human nature which elevate the peasant as well as the peer and make the whole world kin.

Another cause of the popularity of Carleton's poems with the people is the fact of most of them being written in colloquial phraseology, which so readily accommodates itself to the understanding of all, and, moreover, they are admirably adapted to general recitation. They are exceedingly popular at entertainments, and it is no exaggeration to say that they are being constantly declaimed not alone in America but all over the English-speaking world.

But Carleton was more than a nature-poet, he was a poet of the heart, of the affections, of the feelings, of the finest emotions and softest sentiments, which bind families and friends together in indissoluble bonds. He lived in the love of the people, and his memory will be enshrined for long in their keeping.

May the earth lie light upon his breast
And green be the grass thereover.

presented by unclean hands? "Be ye clean, ye that bear the vessels of the Lord!"

Every gift is welcome to the Lord if offered with clean hands. A mite, or a cup of cold water, or our daily labor, or the first-fruits of garden or field—all receive the blessing of our God if the hands that bring them are free from defilement. So is it with everything we offer to the Lord. A song of praise makes sweet music in the hearing of our God if it come from pure lips! Purity, as Thomas à Kempis says, gives the wings which carry everything into the Father's presence.

TUESDAY, January 21. Hebrews 11: 1-6. With what voice shall we speak when we are dead? What will men hear when they turn their thoughts toward us? What part of us will remain alive, singing or jarring in men's remembrance? It is the biggest part of us that retains its voice. In some it is wealth, in others it is goodness: some go on speaking in their cruelty, others in their gentleness. Cain still speaks in his jealous passion. Abel speaks in his faith. Dorcas speaks in her "good works and almsdeeds which she did"; Judas Iscariot speaks in his betrayal. Yes, something goes on speaking. What shall it be?

But these biggest things not only continue to speak in the ears of memory, they persist as actual forces in the common life of men. Our faith is not buried with our bones; nor is our avarice or pride. Our characters do not die when our hearts cease to beat. "The evil that men do lives after them," and so does the good. But deeper than our deeds, our dominant dispositions persist and mingle as friends or enemies in the lives of others. We cannot recall the river of our desires, nor does its influence dry up when our physical strength is spent. By it we, being dead, still speak, and we speak in subtle forces which aid or hinder other pilgrims who are fighting their way to God and heaven.

These Daily Meditations will appear in each issue through 1913

'on't let you come. And, oh, little irl, little girl, I want you so!" he nished brokenly.

Pollyanna rose to her feet with a ng sigh.

"All right. I'll ask her," she said istfully. "Of course I don't mean at I wouldn't like to live here with ou, Mr. Pendleton, but—" She did ot complete her sentence. There as a moment's silence, then she dded: "Well, anyhow, I'm glad I idn't tell her yesterday; 'cause then supposed she was wanted, too."

John Pendleton smiled grimly.

"Well, yes, Pollyanna; I guess it is ust as well you didn't mention it—"

"I didn't—only to the doctor; and f course he doesn't count."

"The doctor!" cried John Pendleton, turning sharply. "Not—Dr. Chilon?"

"Yes; when he came to tell me you vanted me to-day, you know."

"Well, of all the—" muttered the nan, falling back in his chair. Then e sat up with sudden interest. "And vhat did Dr. Chilton say?" he asked.

Pollyanna frowned thoughtfully.

"Why, I don't remember. Not nuch, I reckon. Oh, he did say he ould well imagine you did want to see me."

"Oh, did he, indeed?" answered John Pendleton. And Pollyanna wondered why he gave that sudden, queer ittle laugh.

CHAPTER XVIII

A Question Answered

THE sky was darkening fast with what appeared to be an approaching thunder shower when Pollyanna hurried down the hill from John Pendleton's house. Half way home she met Nancy with an umbrella. By that time, however, the clouds had shifted their position and the shower was not so imminent.

"Guess it's goin' round ter the north," announced Nancy, eyeing the sky critically. "I thought 'twas, all the time, but Miss Polly worried about ye!"

"Did she?" murmured Pollyanna abstractedly, eyeing the clouds in her turn.

Nancy sniffed a little.

"You don't seem ter sense what it means ter have Miss Polly worried about ye, child!"

"Why, it means worried. What else can it mean?"

Nancy tossed her head.

"Well, I'll tell ye what it means. It means she's at last gettin' down somewheres near human—like folks; an' that she ain't jest doin' her duty by ye all the time."

"Why, Nancy," demurred the scandalized Pollyanna. "Aunt Polly always does her duty. She—she's a very dutiful woman!"

Nancy chuckled.

"You're right she is—and she always was, I guess! But she's somethin' more, now, since you came."

Pollyanna's face changed. Her brows drew into a troubled frown.

"There, that's what I was going to ask you, Nancy," she sighed. "Do you think Aunt Polly likes to have me here? Would she mind—if—if I wasn't here any more?"

"Likes ter have ye here? Would she miss ye if ye wan't here?" cried Nancy, indignantly. "As if that wan't jest what I was tellin' of ye! Didn't she send me posthaste with an umbrella 'cause she see a little cloud in the sky? Didn't she make me tote your things all downstairs, so you could have the pretty room you wanted? Why, Miss Pollyanna—when ye remember how at first she hated ter have—"

With a choking cough Nancy pulled herself up just in time.

"And it ain't jest things I can put my finger on, neither," plunged on Nancy, breathlessly. "It's little ways she has that shows how you've been softenin' her up an' mellerin' her down—the cat and the dog, and the way she speaks ter me, and—oh, lots of things. Why, Miss Pollyanna, there ain't no tellin' how she'd miss ye—if ye wan't here," finished Nancy.

"Oh, Nancy, I'm so glad—glad—glad! You don't know how glad I am that Aunt Polly—wants me!"

"As if I'd leave her now!" thought Pollyanna, as she climbed the stairs to her room a little later. "I always knew I wanted to live with Aunt Polly—but I reckon maybe I didn't know quite how much I wanted Aunt Polly—to want to live with me!"

ANSWERED PRAYERS

I WISH to publish through your Answered Prayer column that God has wonderfully brought us out of the darkness of Judaism into the marvelous light of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, through the prayers of a dear Christian friend. There are six of us, husband, wife and four children." Mrs. D. S. N., Brooklyn, N. Y.

That is the very best kind of good news. All Gentile Christians ought to pray and labor earnestly that the families of God's chosen people should be led to the light and joy of the Gospel of his Son. They have everything to gain and nothing to lose. All the splendor of their traditions and their history come to their richest fulfilment in the salvation which Jesus brings. It is sad indeed to contemplate that the Jews, after contributing so much toward bringing salvation and a knowledge of God's Word to the world, should stay outside the glory which they helped to make possible. Keep praying for the Jews. Try, with prayerful patience and tact, to get them acquainted with Jesus.

"A son who has passed through very trying experiences in Mexico has come out safe; another, who has been ill, is restored to health; and a daughter is growing better after a long period of illness." Mrs. E. C. J., of Quitman, Ga., sends this good news in thanksgiving for which The Christian Herald Family joins her. Another grateful mother, Mrs. G. B. P., writes from Grinnell, Ia.: "I wish to acknowledge in our dear Christian Herald that my prayers have been answered in the salvation of my dear son."

Here are testimonies from still other happy homes: "In my great sorrow and trouble God answered my prayer in a lovely and unexpected way. All praise be his. I hope I may ever prove worthy of his love." Mrs. L. P., Seattle, Wash. Mrs. S., Lynneville, Tenn., writes: "I want to acknowledge to the world that God has wonderfully answered my prayers in behalf of loved ones, especially an absent brother. I prayed for his return and healing from fever. The Lord is blessedly merciful and hears my many prayers and answers them."

Further acknowledgments of answered prayer have been received from:

STARTING SEEDS IN THE HOUSE

WHERE there is no convenient hotbed for the early starting of seeds, or in the case of such tender greenhouse plants as require more careful handling than a hotbed affords, recourse may be had to boxes of earth in the house; these boxes, known to the florists as flats, should be shallow and of a size easily handled and not too large to sit on a window ledge or shelf without danger of tipping. The half-size cigar boxes, or the large size cut in half and the lid utilized as the bottom of the upper half, make excellent flats for seeds of such plants as calceolarias, cinnerarias, begonias and the like, while somewhat larger flats will be found useful for asters, balsams, salvias and the like. A very convenient box is made by taking or making one of the length of a window sill, and as wide as convenient, and making the back six inches or more high, the front being cut down to three or four inches, and the ends to correspond. This, when fitted with a glass lid on hinges, makes a miniature indoor hotbed, and by placing thin pieces of wood across the box at intervals, a number of varieties of seed may be sown in the same box.

Whatever boxes or flats are used should be fitted with a number of small holes in the bottom for drainage, and these should be covered with bits of glass before placing the soil in them. The best soil to use is a good compost, consisting of leaf mold, good garden loam, and a little sharp, white sand. This should be free from all rough matter, especially where it is to be used for very fine seed, and should be placed in the boxes to within an inch or less of the top, according to the size of the box. Jar the earth down evenly before sewing the seed, and press the soil firmly above the seed after sowing. Seed of such plants as begonias, cinnerarias, calceolarias and the like is so fine as to be scarcely perceptible, and should not be covered with soil, but merely sifted lightly and as evenly as possible over the surface of the earth, and the earth pressed down with a bit of smooth board or a glass paperweight. Larger seed may be strewn over the surface and covered lightly with fine earth or fine, white sand sifted evenly over, and the whole pressed down. Still coarser seeds may be sown in drills of a quarter of an inch in depth, and the earth drawn over them and pressed down.

After the seed is sown and the boxes labeled with name of seed and date of sowing, the flats should be watered by standing them for a few moments in a pan of lukewarm water. The water should be allowed to rise to the surface but not overflow it, and all surplus water should be allowed to drain away by tipping the box up on one corner.

A place where the temperature varies as little as possible should be selected for the germination of the seeds. A shelf above a radiator or register, or one back of a coal stove, or even the top of the warming oven on the kitchen range, providing a fire is maintained throughout the twenty-four hours, will answer every requirement, but it will be fatal to seeds of tender plants to allow the temperature to fall below sixty-five.

After the flats are placed in position cover each with a sheet of white paper and a piece of glass. Inspect the flats two or three times a day in order to guard against too much moisture or drying out. When drops of water gather on the under side of the glass or paper, the soil is too wet, and the glass should be raised a little until the surplus moisture has evaporated. If too dry, moisture may be restored by setting the flat in a shallow pan of water for a few moments.

Seeds of various plants are very uneven in their period of germination, some requiring but a few days to appear above ground, while others require as many weeks, so that one should, if possible, inform oneself as to just the length of time required and add this to the label; then one will know just about when to expect the appearance of the tiny plants above ground and much anxiety and disappointment will be avoided.

As soon as the plants appear the paper should be discarded and considerable light allowed. If the place is too dark it will be necessary to remove the flats to a lighter but not less warm position. A warm sunny window answers well during the day, returning the flats to their former position at night.

AMONG THE WORKERS

—A FIVE WEEKS' evangelistic campaign conducted by Dr. W. E. Biederwolf and associates has closed in Hamilton, Ohio. A large tabernacle, seating five thousand people, was erected, and it is estimated that fully 160,000 persons heard the Gospel message. The local churches had a strong spiritual uplift, and hundreds were received into membership.

—REV. WILLIAM DURBAN, a well known English pastor and writer and for many years a valued correspondent of this journal, died at his residence, 121 Wellmeadow Road, Catford, S. E., London, on December 7 last. Dr. Durban was a great traveler, a graceful and versatile writer and an earnest Christian. His culture and geniality won him many friends here during his frequent visits to America.

—IN A LETTER to Chaplain Teter, of the Florida State prison at Minneola, Fla., Z. P. Freeman, of Terrell, Fla., requests the chaplain to convey the thanks of the prisoners to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which has been going to them weekly, and expresses the wish that it might be furnished to prisoners all through the State. They greatly appreciate the influence of this paper among the prisoners.

—THROUGH THE generosity of Mrs. John Hay, widow of the late Secretary of State, who presented the Gospel Mission of Washington, D. C., with a check for $5,000, the mission was enabled to purchase a fine property on 4½ Street, near Pennsylvania Avenue, where for nearly a year past a successful rescue work has been conducted. The price of the property was $22,000, on which a payment of $5,000 was made. During the past ten months the building has been thoroughly renovated, new fire escapes erected, sanitary plumbing installed, a steam heating plant and an electric fire alarm established. A number of special lines of work are conducted by the Gospel Mission, including the "Washington bread line," "penny lunch," and "penny wood" industry, free dispensary and night shelter for women, also dormitories for men with privilege of free baths, an employment agency, etc. Gospel services are held every night of the year. Mr. Geo. W. Wheeler, chairman, 216 4½ Street, N. W., Washington, D. C., will answer all inquiries.

—THE "PAPER MISSION," conducted by the Women's American Baptist Home Missionary Society, under the management of Rev. B. A. Loving, at Woodward, Okla., continues to do splendid work. Not long ago a missionary at Camp Creek was asked to send the name of a family needing good literature. He had recently found a home where the only reading matter available for the children was of a trashy or vicious type. He forwarded the name of this family, and the home was kept supplied with such papers as the Youth's Companion, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Union Signal, Christian Endeavor World, etc. Other names were sent in, more good literature forwarded, and as a result the whole community was awakened and uplifted. One young man became a preacher and successful evangelist; a church and Sunday school have been established. The "Paper Mission" will be glad to furnish friends with the names of families to which periodicals may be forwarded.

HIGH PRAISE FOR OUR PREMIUMS:

The Christian Herald Almanac for 1913 and the book, The Strange Adventures of Captain Quinton, have been received. The Almanac is an admirable compilation of useful information. The Strange Adventures of Captain Quinton is a most remarkable book, and charmingly written. It is thrilling, entertaining and instructive. In fact, it is a thesaurus of historical and geographical facts, with a description of the lands visited, the nations who inhabit them, their peculiar characteristics, appearance, methods of living and customs, the names of birds, animals, trees and flowers and the seemingly impossible performances of priests and jugglers witnessed by the author. The book is worth many times the cost of it and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and should be owned by every public library and every family.

A Message to Christian Herald Boys and Girls from Mr. Gifford Pinchot, the Famous Naturalist

MOST of the great mistakes and great faults which happen in the world begin as little faults or little mistakes. The wisest saying of one of the wisest men I ever knew was this: "Beware of beginnings."

The boy or the man who wants to go through life able to look any one and every one in the eye, will find few things help him so much as to stand squarely for what he stands for, and squarely against what he is opposed to. It is not the boy or the man who has stopped smoking altogether who finds it hardest to keep from smoking too much. It is the boy or the man who proposes to limit himself to a very little smoking. And the man or the boy who has the most trouble to do right is never the one who takes the square and manly stand. Wholehearted manliness is what makes strong boys grow into strong men. The waverer has never amounted to much since the world began.

Gifford Pinchot

Here and There Together

MY DEAR BOYS AND GIRLS: The enchantment of going into new countries never loses its charm, does it? The old caliph with his wishing-carpet, the princess with her enchanted trunk, the little lame prince with his magic cloak, and a dozen more of the dear "familiars" are only fairy tales, to be sure, but they tell of a very real longing that almost everybody feels to go about the world and see its endless varieties of peoples and places and interesting things. This is why we have planned to go here and there together in our Young People's Corner of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. We shall not be going on a continuous journey, nor shall we have much to say about the ocean voyages or the train trips. We shall just find ourselves quite casually in some interesting place, usually one which is being much talked about, and we shall find things there which will be of special interest and delight to us. For example:

The Ottoman Empire

THE whole of the civilized world today has its mind's eye turned upon Turkey, and we younger folk realize that Turkish rule in Egypt is practically ended forever, and that in our own day and youth a great heathen nation has been forced out of Christian Europe back into the Orient, where it belongs.

But more than all of this, there is something which is so intensely interesting about Turkey and which most people seem to overlook that I want to talk about it here in the Cozy Corner; so next week or the week after we shall just step down to the Ottoman Empire and look about a bit for ourselves.

LITTLE PEOPLE'S CORNER

Ten Little Duties

TEN little duties; 'twill do no good to whine;
Skip about and do one; now there are nine.

Nine little duties; it never pays to wait;
Do one quick, and, presto! there are only eight.

Eight little duties; there might have been eleven;
One done in no time; now there are seven.

Seven little duties; you aren't in such a fix;
Do one more, and, bless me! there are only six.

Six little duties, sure as you're alive!
Never mind, one's over; there are only five.

Five little duties knocking at your door;
Take one off to Doneland, and that leaves only four.

Four little duties, plain as plain can be!
Can't be shirked—it's over, leaving only three.

Three little duties! like a soldier true,
Meet them and vanquish one, and there will be but two.

Two little duties between you and fun;
In just a minute more there will be only one.

One little duty; think—only one!
Do it? Why, yes, surely; and now they all are done.

Little Boy Blue, Come Blow Your Horn

DREADED TO EAT
A Quaker Couple's Experience

How many persons dread to eat their meals, although actually hungry nearly all the time!

Nature never intended this should be so, for we are given a thing called appetite that should guide us as to what the system needs at any time and can digest.

But we get in a hurry, swallow our food very much as we shovel coal into the furnace, and our sense of appetite becomes unnatural and perverted. Then we eat the wrong kind of food or eat too much, and there you are—indigestion and its accompanying miseries.

A Phila. lady said:

"My husband and I have been sick and nervous for 15 or 20 years from drinking coffee—feverish, indigestion, totally unfit, a good part of the time, for work or pleasure. We actually dreaded to eat our meals. (Tea is just as injurious, because it contains caffeine, the same drug found in coffee.)

"We tried doctors and patent medicines that counted up into hundreds of dollars, with little if any benefit.

"Accidentally, a small package of Postum came into my hands. I made some according to directions, with surprising results. We both liked it and have not used any coffee since.

"The dull feeling after meals has left us and we feel better every way. We are so well satisfied with Postum that we recommend it to our friends who have been made sick and nervous and miserable by coffee." Name given upon request. Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Postum now comes in concentrated, powder form, called Instant Postum. It is prepared by stirring a level teaspoonful in a cup of hot water, adding sugar to taste, and enough cream to bring the color to golden brown.

Instant Postum is convenient; there's no waste; and the flavor is always uniform. Sold by grocers—50-cup tin 30 cts., 100-cup tin 50 cts.

A 5-cup trial tin mailed for grocer's name and 2-cent stamp for postage. Postum Cereal Co., Ltd., Battle Creek, Mich.

THE VOICE OF THE NATION ON ROME

A Washington View of "Ne Temere"

THE article in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of August 14, 1912, entitled "The Pope and the Ne Temere Decree," seemed almost incredible in this country, and it should be, yet it is true in every particular, I verily believe.

We have no contention with the individual adherents of the Catholic Church in this country, for they are usually good people, doing much good work, and as loyal to our flag, which is their flag as well, as is possible for them to be while under the power of a foreign potentate. Many would, I believe, stand by our flag and country, regardless of what the Pope might say to the contrary; but we are sorry that so many of our American-born citizens are connected therewith, and permit themselves to be governed by a foreigner, who is opposed to our free institutions.

In the article referred to, you intimate that possibly Joannes Homa is without the requisite means to prosecute that slanderer of his character. This may be correct, or he may be so completely under the control of the Pope that he has not the courage to prosecute Radoczy. I am sorry that money seems to be necessary in such a case to bring such an offender to court for the punishment he deserves, for it is plainly the duty of our officials to take notice of all infractions and disregard of the laws of the land.

A question affecting that church is now up to the Administration for a solution, but the evidence may not all be in, so that a decision may not be announced before the election. This action of the Catholic Church is simply nullification, which is a near relative of treason, and should be dealt with as such, and if we had officials more like President Jackson, there would be something done in the matter of the disrespect for law by the Pope.

The Emperor of Germany protects his subjects, and does not allow the Pope to interfere with laws in his dominion. All honor to him!

The United States, through the officials, should not do less for her citizens; but they will do nothing in this case.

In 1845, the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church held that baptism in the Romish Church was not valid, for the reason that the priest was an agent of and represented the Pope, and not a church of Christ. In 1875 it voted to leave the question of baptism in the Catholic Church to be settled by the session of the individual church. I am of the opinion that this was a mistake. But if a priest cannot baptize, what right has he to celebrate marriage? I believe that of all people who have been married, none are as illegally married as those who were married by a Catholic priest. ALFRED SHAW.

Catholic School Teachers on the Isthmus

A READER of this journal in Cristobal, Canal Zone, Panama, writes: "The statement that no Protestant could open a school, public or private, without the agreement to allow a Roman Catholic teacher to teach Spanish, is true. Several who teach private schools here in the Isthmus are British, and some parents do not want their children to go to the public schools of Panama because of Rome's influences; and while no letters have been sent, police officers have notified schools that they must close until they could employ a Spanish teacher. This has been done all over the Isthmus. One teacher has a private school in Christian Mission Hall, and has over one hundred children, mostly born in the British West Indies. He has the services of a Spanish teacher two hours each week. His wife teaches a few in her own home and she also must have the Spanish teacher two hours weekly. I do not know how many private schools there are in Colon—at least six—and they combine together in paying this same teacher. These and others are private schools, their pupils being mostly the children of British laborers who work for the Isthmus Canal Company (English Protestants, all of them)."

How His Eyes Were Opened

A CORRESPONDENT, writing from Virginia, says, after referring to Professor Dau's articles: "The alarming feature is that people, as a whole, do not know and understand what the political activities of Rome mean, and, judging from my own experience, I believe that the masses are not aware of conditions as they really exist. I was not, and I actually sent my child, a Protestant, to a convent, but as soon as I realized that this was wrong, I put her in a Protestant seminary. I liked the convent, and sent her there when I believed that the Roman Church was only a religious body; but after I had read about her political activities, studied her ancient history, and understood that she means to take away liberty here as she has done in other countries (and she will destroy it if she can), I saw what it meant. I feel sure, however, that there are millions of my countrymen who do not see or understand this menace any more than I did when I patronized a convent for my daughter."

Temporal Power Now Only "a Dream"

A RECENT cablegram from Rome to the New York Tribune says: "It is again stated on high authority that the king of Italy is about to assume the title of Emperor of Rome. If this be true, it will be symbolical of the last step in the union of the kingdom of Italy, for the Papal States, or the 'Holy Roman Empire,' were the last part of the present kingdom to accept the new régime. The Popes have always been opposed to the kingdom, and even up to 1905 forbade Roman Catholics to take any part in the political life of the country. Temporal power is now, however, little more than a dream, as the present king's popularity has done much to consolidate the position of the House of Savoy."

HOUSEHOLD HINTS

Sandpaper will be of assistance when unscrewing can-tops, and if a strip of sandpaper is tacked underneath all mantle shelves where there are fireplaces, the woodwork will be saved many an injurious scratch.

Rice-water prepared in the following way is excellent for removing iron-rust, and will not injure the most delicate material. In two quarts of water, boil one cupful of rice for thirty minutes. Let cool and then strain through cheesecloth.

To prolong the usefulness of rubber gloves, change them occasionally from one hand to the other. This may be done by turning the gloves inside out. You will get more than double the wear from them, because the right glove, by constant use on the right hand, wears out much sooner than the left glove.

An ordinary corn-popper may be used for toasting bread, washing small fruits or berries, such as currants, raisins, cranberries, huckleberries, etc. Fill the corn-popper with the article to be washed, close down the cover, hold under the faucet, or shake gently in a large pan of water, then allow to drain.

A reliable fire-extinguisher, which throws chemicals instead of water, should hang in every home, in the barn and in the stable. Seconds are precious when fire breaks out, and the small, inexpensive extinguishers are so simple of use and quick of action that they at once arrest the progress of a small blaze. Motorists have found the little extinguishers invaluable.

A BOOK FOR EVERY MEMBER OF THE FAMILY

The Pictorial Life of Christ

Dr. Sandison told you last week: "While THE CHRISTIAN HERALD produces many books, most of them of good quality of workmanship, this is easily the superior of them all. When we secured the right of publication and set about the work of production, several months ago, we brought to the task all the loving care and forethought that we could expend on a book that dealt with the greatest theme in the world—the Life of our Saviour on earth. In the reproduction of Mastroianni's sculptures, we spared no expense. The engravings are the finest that can be produced; the paper of the best quality for work of this class; even the inks were chosen with a care such as we have bestowed on no other work in my recollection, and this applies to both letterpress and illustrations. Its covers are a triumph of the binder's art, beautiful in design, chaste and appropriate in finish."

We will send you, postpaid, The Pictorial Life of Christ, The Christian Herald Almanac for 1913, and The Christian Herald for One Year—all for $3

Twilight Tales. By Margaret E. Sangster

Twilight Tales comes almost as a parting message from one who has been greatly beloved by countless multitudes, and whose contributions for many years in the pages of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD have made her name a household word.

There is a thread of pure gold running through the Twilight Tales from which the reader may divine the author's purpose in writing the book. It is the line of God's protecting love and care which encircles all who trust in him, and the knowledge of which gives to even the smallest detail of everyday life a purpose and significance. She spreads before us the little daily dramas, the heartaches, the disappointments, the sweet surprises and unexpected joys, the separations and the reunions, the cares and consolations of the household, the "journeys that end in lovers' meetings"—all are unrolled like a moving picture, with the vivid action of life itself. Mrs. Sangster has crowded the best heart and soul stories of her whole career into this book. Love, romance, self-denial, ambition and the success that true character commands are here pictured with a fragrant setting of American home-life in town and country. It is a book which will exert a strong spell on the mind of the reader and which creates its own atmosphere of woodlands and old-fashioned gardens and charming American homes, and her men and women are such as we love to meet.

We will send a copy of Twilight Tales, postpaid, The Christian Herald Almanac for 1913, and The Christian Herald for One Year, for only $2

OR, we will send to old subscribers Free, as a premium, Twilight Tales, for sending us one new yearly subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD with $1.50.

Strange Adventures of Capt. Quinton

We believe The Strange Adventures of Captain Quinton to be one of the most remarkable books of its kind yet published. More than all, it is true. It is not a mere figment of the imagination. The things described really happened. Open the book at any place, and you will find him encountering one or more of innumerable perils, sanguinary experiences which must be read with bated breath, yet not more thrilling in their way than are the exquisite descriptions of treasure-chambers in caves lurid and beautiful as a dream of Arabian Nights; of a wave dance in which tribes of cannibals with an uncanny sense of beauty and rhythm represent with their bodies the ocean dashing high on imaginary coral reefs; of a silvery night spent in tropical tree tops in order to witness the stately dawn-dance of birds of paradise. The very multiplicity of incident is overpowering, but it must be remembered that the experiences of over thirty years are crowded into this book. 496 pages, in illustrated binding.

We will send you, postpaid, The Strange Adventures of Captain Quinton (handsomely bound in cloth), The Christian Herald Almanac for 1913, and The Christian Herald for One full Year—all three for only $2

OR, we will send to old subscribers Free, as a premium, The Strange Adventures of Captain Quinton for sending us one new yearly subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD with $1.50.

The Portrait Life of Lincoln

Here is a book every man and boy will want. It is the greatest collection of Lincoln photographs ever made, the majority of which were part of the great collection of photographs made by Mathew B. Brady during the Civil War. Among the 110 treasures are the first portrait ever taken of Lincoln; photographs of Lincoln taken when his name first passed over the country during the Lincoln-Douglas debates; photographs taken while he was running for United States Senator; during the Missouri Compromise; on the battle ground of Antietam, the bloodiest day in the Civil War; last photograph of Lincoln ever taken; Secret Service photographs of Lincoln's assassins taken on the gallows; photographs of the funeral bier and procession while Lincoln was being taken on his sixteen-hundred-mile journey to Springfield, when twenty-five million people were attending memorial services to the martyred President.

We will send you, postpaid, The Portrait Life of Lincoln, The Christian Herald Almanac for 1913, and The Christian Herald for One Year—all for $2

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETINGS

NOTES ON THE CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR, EPWORTH LEAGUE AND BAPTIST YOUNG PEOPLE'S UNION TOPICS

The Prospect in Africa*

DIFFERENT people think of different things when they think of Africa. To some it means diamonds. There are acres and acres of diamond fields from which come bright jewels for the fair fingers and throats of the ladies of Christendom and the East. To some it means the jungles where thrive the rubber plants from which automobile tires and other rubber goods are made. To some it means chocolate trees for the making of favorite cocoa or your favorite candies.

Africa suggests all these things and many more. But to an Epworth Leaguer or a Young Baptist, Africa ought to mean souls to be saved. Perhaps Africa suggests to you the dear face of some friend who is giving his life to bring the light of the Gospel to that dark land. Perhaps it suggests to you, as it does to me, the face of a friend who laid down his life there in service for the Master.

John Ludwig Krapf, the pioneer of the East Coast Mission, dreamed of an "Apostle Street" of missions to run through the continent from north to south, forming a junction with another line running from east to west, the two making a gigantic cross, the signal of Africa's hope. Now the Nile Missions almost touch the line coming up from the south and the Congo Missions reach almost to the line coming in from the east, thus almost fulfilling Krapf's great dream, and beside these missions there is the Gospel line extending around the coast.

It is a critical time in Africa. Mohammedanism is making great strides. The native must choose between Mohammed and Jesus. The church should be more than ever alert to present the claims of our matchless Christ. The African mind can apprehend him; the African soul can let him in. Many happy reports are coming of converts won to the Saviour. In his most remarkable book, Thinking Black, Mr. D. Crawford tells the story of his twenty-two years in the heart of Africa. He describes, for instance, the work of a converted elephant-hunter, who while off on the trail preaches Christ to the other natives. Sometimes he finds villages of whose existence no one has known—lost villages. "What do I do?" he asks; "I let my herd of elephants escape, and stay with these scared-of-eye Africans. Did not God lead me to them? And if God's way is our way, will not his joy be our joy?"

Mr. Crawford continues:

"He has lost his elephants owing to this intercepting town—

"But all through the mountains, thunder-riven,
And up from the rocky steep,
There arose a cry to the gates of heaven:
'Rejoice! I have found my sheep!'
And the angels echoed around the throne,
'Rejoice! For the Lord brings back his own!'

"Thus he tells his tale. His profession is elephants, but his confession is Christ. And who would compare profession with confession—what are literal elephants to spiritual sheep? Not once but several times has he broken in on such old-world folks—a true mission to the lost."

Of the passages assigned for Bible study note especially Isa. 9: 2-7, the bright picture of a land awakening to redemption. "The people that walked in darkness have seen a great light; they that dwell in the land of the shadow of death, upon them hath the light shined." A curious error which crept into the Authorized Version of the third verse has been corrected in the Revised Version, the American Revision, and the new Baptist Edition. The word "not" should, of course, be omitted. These wonderful verses are of equal comfort and glory for the individual and for the nation. Christ is indeed Wonderful, Counselor, the Mighty God, the Everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace. He breaks the oppressing yokes, and when the "government" is placed "upon his shoulder" there is peace for the soul and justice and stability for the nation.

* EPWORTH LEAGUE LESSON for January 26, 1913. "The Prospect in Africa." Isa. 18: 1-7. BAPTIST YOUNG PEOPLE'S UNION TOPIC: "Africa of Yesterday, To-day and To-morrow." Isa. 9: 18-21; 9: 2-7.

"To the Work!"*

WHO could ever have had the thought that it was dull, uninteresting, prosaic business to be a Christian? Of all the fascinating, romantic, brave, alluring calls the call to follow Christ stands first. Think of it! With eleven men he undertook to capture the world. Now that first eleven has grown to many millions. And still his clear challenge sounds to every new follower that enters his ranks: "Go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel unto every creature."

Of all the chapters of this story of Christ's conquest of the world, few are more thrilling than the chapter which will tell of the place that young people have had in the accelerated missionary movement of the closing years of the nineteenth century and the first years of the twentieth. The Student Volunteer Movement, the Young People's Missionary Movement and the organized missionary activities of the young people of various denominations have been full of stories of heroism and splendor, many of which equal the martyr tales of the earliest centuries of the Christian church. Many, many tears have been shed at the bitterness of leaving home and parents and friends; blood, too, has been shed. But through it all has been the touch of glory, the splendor of holy living and working, the grandeur of real victories.

One of the wonderful things about this new movement is that every single individual can have a definite and helpful part in it. Go to the foreign field if you can. That is the very highest and noblest life a young American man or woman can be called to live. If not to the foreign field then to some place in our own land where people are in special need of the Gospel and its message. Or if you are clear in your own mind that you should not give up your life specifically to Gospel work, yet make it the real business of your life to tell people about Christ and his salvation, even while you are engaged with your other tasks. Read the story of the converted elephant-hunter found near the close of the B. Y. P. U. and Epworth League lesson. Recall the old saying of the cobbler who declared that his business was winning souls and that he made shoes to pay expenses.

The reason so many Christians get so little joy out of their religious life is that they put so little energy and enthusiasm into it. How much pleasure would you get out of playing football if you played it as many of you play the great game of following Christ? It is not sacrilegious to speak of that as a game, for Paul did so, more than once. What he really said in that famous saying in which he summed up his life work was not literally: "I have fought a good fight," but "I have played a good game."

Are you playing the game hard? It is a contest worthy the best of America's young blood. If you can't go, give—give all you can and get others to give. And learn how to pray for missions and missionaries. But every one of us, whether or not we may be on a distinct mission field here or abroad, can be a soul-winner. How many people are you going to bring to Christ in 1913?

* CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR LESSON for January 26, 1913. "Mission Work at Home and Abroad." Evangelism. Acts 13: 14-44.

Each a Lucky Car

By R. E. Olds, Designer

Even when cars are skimped and rushed, an occasional car gives wondrous satisfaction.

No costly repairs, no troubles, no breaks. The man who gets it tells his friends he got a lucky car.

But every buyer of Reo the Fifth gets a lucky car. This is how I insure it:

Endless Care

In 26 years spent building cars I've learned what strength is needed.

To insure that strength I twice analyze every lot of steel.

I test my gears with a crushing machine of 50 tons' capacity.

I have another machine to test my springs for 100,000 vibrations.

Then, to make doubly sure, I give each driving part 50 per cent over-capacity. Each is made ample, by actual test, for a 45-horsepower engine. That means immense margin of safety.

Extra Cost

Drop forgings, on the average, cost twice as much as steel castings. But steel castings often have hidden flaws. So in Reo the Fifth I use 190 drop forgings.

Roller bearings cost five times as much as the usual ball bearings. But ball bearings often break. So in Reo the Fifth I use 15 roller bearings, 11 Timken and 4 Hyatt High Duty.

This year I have added 30 per cent to my tire cost to add 65 per cent to your tire mileage. Note how big my tires are for a car of this size and weight.

Ending Trouble

To deal with low-grade gasoline I doubly heat my carburetor. I use a hot air intake, plus hot water wrapping.

I use a $75 magneto to end ignition troubles.

Each engine is tested 20 hours on blocks and 28 hours in the chassis. There are five long-continued tests.

Every car in the making gets a thousand inspections. Parts are ground over and over to get utter exactness. And I limit my output to 50 cars daily so nothing is ever rushed.

Enduring Luxury

Each body is given 17 coats to insure enduring finish. The deep Turkish upholstering is of genuine leather filled with the best curled hair. So it doesn't sag and grow rusty.

Two front lights are electric, set flush with the dash. The old-style side lamps have been abandoned. The rear light is also electric.

This car in every detail shows the final touch.

Center Control

This car alone has my center control. All the gear shifting is done by moving a small handle only three inches in each of four directions.

No side levers; no brake levers—nothing in the way. Both brakes are operated by foot pedals.

This arrangement permits of the left-side drive, now considered essential, to bring the driver close to the car he passes.

When you see what these things mean you will not go without them.

What Precaution Costs

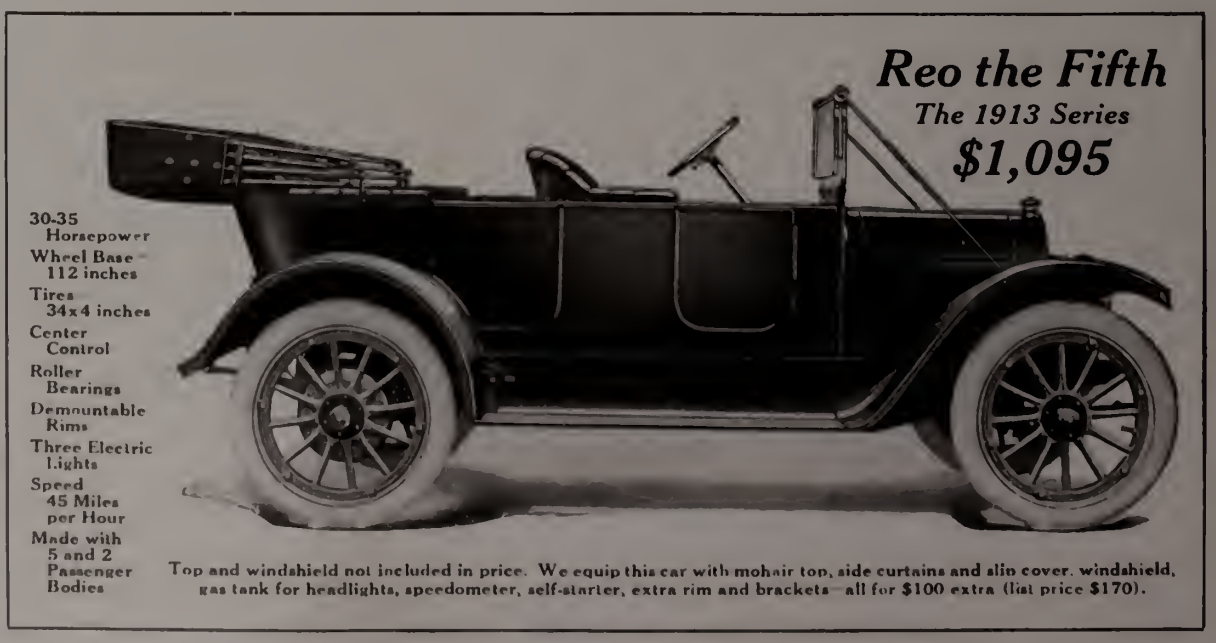
I could build Reo the Fifth without all these precautions for some $200 less. But this added cost saves the average buyer several times as much. It insures a car that's flawless, durable and right.

So we save in other ways. We build only one model, which saves some 20 per cent. We have cut down our profits. We employ wondrous factory efficiency.

As a result, we give you a car such as I describe at a price that's unmatchable—$1,095.

I build it for men who want beauty and luxury, combined with all the hidden worth that any price can buy.

Write for our 1913 catalog. Then go to the nearest of our thousand dealers and see this new-model car.



Top and windshield not included in price. We equip this car with mohair top, side curtains and slip cover, windshield, gas tank for headlights, speedometer, self-starter, extra rim and brackets—all for $100 extra (list price $170).

Questions and Answers

A. G. B., Van Wert, Ia. Why did the Lord have respect to Abel and his offering and not to Cain and his? (Gen. 4: 3-7.)

There must have been a wrong spirit in Cain. Verse 7 states: "If thou doest well, shalt thou not be accepted? And if thou doest not well sin lieth at the door." There have been many interpretations suggested for the last part of this verse; but whatever translation may be given the specific words the whole narrative implies that the trouble with Cain was with his motive. He did not come humbly, worshipfully, as Abel did, and probably his offering was less costly, less of a real sacrifice. Again it has been thought that in the acceptance of the animal sacrifice and the rejection of the fruit sacrifice there was a suggestion of the fact that sin requires death for an atonement. Abel's was the first of the long line of offerings for sin in which blood was shed, culminating in the sacrifice of Christ's body on the cross.

H. M. S., Nowata, Okla. How much does the maintenance of the United States Army cost annually?

The appropriation for this year amounts to $93,088,664. This sum does not include the expenditures by the several States on their National Guard, nor the enormous sums paid for pensions; neither does it include the cost of fortifications, military academy, etc.

M. B., Buffalo, N. Y. Can a straight line be scientifically defined as the shortest distance between two points?

The old mathematicians and geometers so defined it, including Euclid himself, but the advance of modern science has compelled us to question some of the postulates and axioms laid down by the early experimenters, which seemed self-evident to them and still appear self-evident to us without close investigation. What is known as non-Euclidian geometry has established the fact that certain properties of space long regarded as fundamental are but the result of experience and not necessarily essential. As to the straight line, suppose that instead of three dimensions one looked upon the universe from a two-dimensional standpoint. To such an inhabitant of spherical space the shortest line between two points, which to him would be a straight line, would in reality be part of a great circle, since the earth is a sphere, and being such how could it be regarded as straight? We have no space to fully or satisfactorily enter into this matter, which at any rate belongs to the domain of higher mathematics. Consult a text-book.

C. L., Frankford, W. Va. Can a man saved by grace resist a call to the ministry and continue to receive the full benefits of the atonement?

No one can disobey God about anything and keep his salvation. If the call to the ministry is clear and unmistakable, a man must obey it. If he refuses and gets into spiritual darkness he may be forgiven, and circumstances might be such that the same demand would not be repeated. It is probable, though [illegible], as in Jonah's case, the call would come [illegible]. It is extremely foolish and fearfully [illegible] ous to trifle with God's commands. The way of peace and power lies in simple obedience.

S. R. K., Eureka, Nev. At what time between 10 o'clock and 11 o'clock should the hands of a watch be exactly together?

Fifty-four and six-elevenths minutes past 10 o'clock or five and five-elevenths minutes before 11 o'clock.

Mrs. C. H. O'C., Brooklyn, N. Y. Please explain Ps. 37: 25.

1. David here was expressing his own experience. He himself had felt temporary destitution, as, for instance, when he had begged sustenance from the wealthy Nabal. But he is testifying now that, though passing evils may afflict those who trust in God, they will not be permanent or continuous evils. The object of the Psalm is to counteract the temptation to fretfulness at the temporary wants of the godly, and to show that they are exempt from permanent abandonment if they trust in Him. He does not raise hopes only to disappoint them. We have many instances of this within our own experience, where need arises and the hands of God's people reach out, full of help and succor. Thus we may come under the harrow for a time; but if we trust in him, the help will come. 2. The gossip, the slanderer, the "teller of tales" who confesses her wrongdoing should ask for strength to be kept from similar temptation in the future. First, however, she should right the wrong, if this be possible. This, unfortunately, is a too common failing. 3. We cannot advise us to the other question in your letter. Consult a physician.

Three Great Books

The Pictorial Life of Christ

While THE CHRISTIAN HERALD produces many books of good quality of workmanship, this is easily the superior of them all. When we secured the right of publication and set about the work of production of The Pictorial Life of Christ several months ago, we brought to the task all the loving care and forethought that we could expend on a book that dealt with the greatest theme in the world—the Life of our Saviour on earth. In the reproduction of Mastroianni's sculptures, we spared no expense. The engravings are the finest that can be produced; the paper of the best quality for work of this class; even the inks were chosen with a care such as we have bestowed on no other work, and this applies to both letterpress and illustrations. Its covers are a triumph of the binder's art, beautiful in design, chaste and appropriate in finish.

We will send you, postpaid, The Pictorial Life of Christ, The Christian Herald Almanac for 1913, and The Christian Herald for One Year—all for $3

OR, we will send to old subscribers Free, as a premium, The Pictorial Life of Christ for sending us two new yearly subscriptions to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD with $1.50 each.

Strange Adventures of Capt. Quinton

We believe The Strange Adventures of Captain Quinton to be one of the most remarkable books of its kind yet published. More than all, it is true. It is not a mere figment of the imagination. The things described really happened. Open the book at any place, and you will find him encountering one or more of innumerable perils, sanguinary experiences which must be read with bated breath, yet not more thrilling in their way than are the exquisite descriptions of treasure-chambers in caves lurid and beautiful as a dream of the Arabian Nights; of a wave dance in which tribes of cannibals with an uncanny sense of beauty and rhythm represent with their bodies the ocean dashing high on imaginary coral reefs; of a silvery night spent in tropical tree tops in order to witness the stately dawn-dance of birds of paradise. The very multiplicity of incident is overpowering, but it must be remembered that the experiences of over thirty years are crowded into this book. 496 pages, in illustrated binding.

We will send you, postpaid, The Strange Adventures of Captain Quinton (handsomely bound in cloth), The Christian Herald Almanac for 1913, and The Christian Herald for One full Year—all three for only $2

OR, we will send to old subscribers Free, as a premium, The Strange Adventures of Captain Quinton for sending us one new yearly subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD with $1.50.

The Portrait Life of Lincoln

Here is a book every man and boy will want. It is the greatest collection of Lincoln photographs ever made, the majority of which were part of the collection made by Mathew B. Brady during the Civil War. Among the 110 treasures are the first portrait ever taken of Lincoln; photographs of Lincoln taken when his name first passed over the country during the Lincoln-Douglas debates, and the last photograph of Lincoln ever taken.

We will send you, postpaid, The Portrait Life of Lincoln, The Christian Herald Almanac for 1913, and The Christian Herald for One Year—all for $2

OR, we will send to old subscribers Free, as a premium, The Portrait Life of Lincoln, for sending us one new yearly subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD with $1.50.

Inquirer, Redlands, Calif. Please explain Ac 13: 48.

This is a passage that is much discusse Those Gentiles did not all become believers, b only those in whom the preaching of the apo tles had awakened faith and who, being take into the congregation, had striven earnestly t "make their calling and election sure." I forcibly reminds us that salvation is the gift o God and not in any sense something we ca obtain by our own merit or acts; but at th same time, in order to attain this gift (which i divinely ordained to all those who comply wit certain conditions), we must put ourselves i the attitude of faith and belief. Further throughout the whole Scriptures, there is a per vading sense of the fact that many are specially called to be saints, who are obedient to the sum mons and yet who before were not in such attitude. The case of Paul is an illustration in point. He was called right out of the midst of his sinful life of persecution. Some commentators hold that in the case of these Gentiles, God had chosen for himself certain men to become witness-bearers and to be set apart for a special work. Still other interpreters make the passage read: "As many as disposed themselves to eternal life believed," referring to I. Cor. 16: 15. We may add, by way of further explanation, that while the call to salvation is a universal one, the call to special service is one that comes only to the few.

C. M. J., Farmer City, Ill., and Mrs. G. D. V., Cardwell, Va. See explanation of Luke 7: 28 in a recent issue of THE MAIL-BAG.

Mrs. L. L. G., Petoskey, Mich. There is no special rule or form laid down in Scripture concerning the ordinance. The Lord regards the spirit rather than the form of worship.

R. F. C., Gautier, Miss. The discussion of predestination and free will would be an endless controversy. They have been the subjects of numerous treatises. God has given man the power to distinguish between good and evil, and his volition, therefore, is free in its essential nature. Any other reasoning would be fatalism.

C. L., Meta, Mo. You raise a constitutional question which can only be answered by a constitutional authority. For your other questions we must refer you to the sole source of reliable information, the Census Bureau in Washington. Father Russell Explains

REV. WILLIAM T. RUSSELL of St. Patrick's Rectory, Washington, D. C., writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD regarding the article on the Pan-American Thanksgiving Mass, which appeared in a recent issue:

The Pan-American Thanksgiving Day celebration was inaugurated by myself. Its purpose, as I first outlined it to Mr. Barrett, the director of the Pan-American Bureau at Washington, and to the President, was to effect a closer union in an unofficial way among the representative men of the American republics. Such a meeting, when the distinguished men of the various republics could meet together amicably, free from the diplomatic restraints of official life, is calculated, I believe, to further friendly relations among the republics. It further occurred to me that the day most appropriate for such a peace gathering would be our own national Thanksgiving Day. At the first meeting, the Honorable Secretary of State, seeing the good fellowship that prevailed, and realizing that this would make for the better understanding of one another by the representatives of the republics, suggested that I have the celebration annually. This has been the purpose of this celebration.

In pursuance of our policy of giving both sides a hearing we take pleasure in printing Father Russell's letter, which gives the interpretation from his point of view.

Sunset Over China's Great Highway, the Yangtse

Some of China's Future Womanhood in a Christian School at Nanking

Typifying China, Looking from Darkness into Light

THE NEW AND OLD IN CHINA

BY Z. CHARLES BEALS

MOST of you are familiar with what God has been doing through the high schools and colleges in China toward preparing young men for advanced positions in every walk of life. These lives were telling greatly in China. Their influence has spread so to the government schools that the students there are going forth preaching against idols and superstition as earnestly as some of our church evangelists and teachers, and the idols are being cleared out of homes and temples.

The revolution came as the culmination of years of development toward the light of Christianity and the standards of Western civilization. Then in itself it swung the pendulum of progress forward with a mighty impetus. To the minds of the younger generation, it may fairly be said, old things are passed away and all things are made new. Ideas and ideals loaded with the dust of ages have been tumbled from their pedestals to give place to the ideas of progress and the ideals of Christianity. It will never be an easy task to estimate the influence of Christianity in the establishment of the new régime, but even that were easier than to overestimate it. Many of the leaders of the revolution —conspicuous among them the provisional president, Dr. Sun Yat Sen—as well as thousands in the ranks, were Christians. This mighty change in China has left its mark on all the people. They hold their heads higher and speak about their new republic with great pride.

Years ago we selected our native workers from our congregations; those who had been wondrously saved from opium, and those who had a good, bright testimony to give. In fact, it was the best we had. Very often they were very unlearned, and their sermons had more fire than enlightenment. One of these old preachers was Mr. Chang. He came to our mission door one day a miserable opium sot, all rags and dirt. He had sold his property, his wife and daughter, and lastly his son, for the drug. Now he was an outcast whom none would allow inside their homes.

As he sat on the mission doorstep one day he heard the evangelist preaching inside about a Saviour who could save all men and keep them saved. He wanted to know more, so he stepped inside and sat on a back bench. After a while he asked if the preacher thought God could save him. When he was assured that he could, he began to pray and believe from that time. Inside of three weeks he found victory and was wondrously converted. He was cleaned up, and, being a good scholar, he soon became an exhorter. This was eighteen years ago. All these years since his conversion he has continually preached about a Christ who can save to the uttermost. He has worked in the very same district that he used to live in as the opium sot, where all knew him. Yes, we have our Bowery Missions in China.

Evangelist Shee first saw the light at Forty Li Bridge, a village in Anhui Province, Central China. His remote ancestry was more than respectable. His great-grandfather was of the literary class and enjoyed distinction in the dignity of official position. But his parents were very poor and humble, although some of his relatives were village elders, or "headmen." as they are called. At the age of eleven he was initiated into a country schoolhouse, where the pedagogue was an old opium-eater. At the end of six months the bright, good-natured and sturdy lad had to quit school for farming. He was then about twelve years of age. He says of those days that he was a good joker, a bright story-teller, and an indifferent student. His mother died when he was twenty-two years of age. It was about the time of the close of the great Taiping rebellion in China.

His oratorical temperament manifested itself at an early age. From village teachers and others he learned native sonnets, history, proverbs, dramas and songs. So great was the spell, indeed, that at last he determined to become a story-teller himself. Shee first heard the Gospel about 1873. At first, however, he had very crude conceptions of the message. He went to the priests but got no peace of mind; and then to the scholars, but they only talked philosophy. The new story was taking hold of his inner life. The faithful evangelist Chen never lost sight of him, in prayer or in life. At last love conquered.

But what of the terrible opium habit? He felt that he must break with that or be lost forever. It was tightening its death-grip on him every day. He knew that all his previous struggles had been in vain. This was to be the first final ordeal. For seven days and nights, in burning hunger, thirst, weariness and excruciating pain, he was pleading with God in prayer. At last the Lord gave deliverance, and the captive of years was free. From that time his intense zeal has never lagged. With extraordinary faithfulness and constancy he has performed all the manifold duties of an earnest evangelist.

During the riots of 1891 he showed most commendable tact in dealing with hostile mobs. On long journeys to inland cities he has exhibited both experience and caution, in many instances preserving the workers from open violence. Most glorious fruit followed years of patient sowing. It was in 1899 that the audiences began notably to increase. Very soon every Lord's Day witnessed additions to the church. In some districts the idols were cast down and destroyed, and heathen customs abolished, little field temples abandoned, and whole communities became deeply interested in the Christian faith, while scores were gathered into the visible church.

Evangelist Shee is a charming co-worker. He has wit, good nature and common sense. And no trait is more marked than his humility. He is often chosen as chairman of Chinese conventions, and presides with grace, tact and dignity.

In later years we have taken young men from our day schools and are giving them a high school education, with two or three years after in a Bible school, before they go out to preach. This preparation is very necessary now, for Young China is demanding education in every walk of life. We had last year in our Academy and Bible Institute eighty-eight young men who were preparing themselves for Christian work. The revolution broke up the school somewhat, but this year they are rapidly coming back. Many of them are from poor families, who have suffered from the great flood last year and again this year. A number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers in the past have taken some of these students as protégés, and they have found that the English letters written by the students have been a blessing to them. We teach all our students English, as we feel they can understand their Bibles better, and also correspond with their patrons in America or England. These young men are to be the preachers of to-morrow.

God has mightily used some of these young men in the salvation of hundreds. One of them, Ting Li Mei, is called the Apostle to the Chinese. His life and labors have been printed in tract form. He is being especially used now in stirring up the young men in the colleges and universities in Central China.

The Students' Volunteer Movement and the Layman's Missionary Movement have for their motto, "The Evangelization of the World in This Generation." This would be a task that could not be completed if they had no native young men on every mission field who are being prepared to go forth to their own countrymen.

These evangelists go forth to the field, and in almost all cases God honors and blesses their messages in the salvation of very many. Shall we, ourselves, be true in our day and generation, so that when he comes to make up his jewels, we can hear him say, "Well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord"?

IS THE YOUNG MAN SAFE?

A SERMON

BY

Rev. C. L. Goodell, D.D.*

TEXT: "Is the young man Absalom safe?" II. Sam. 18: 32

BEFORE one can answer that question about any young man a very important question to ask is—what has been his training? From what kind of a home does he come? It is sad to say that though this particular young man came from the home of a king and of a psalmist, he found little enough there that would help him in his life. Some one has said that "polygamy" is just Greek for "pollution"; and that has proved to be true both in Absalom's time and in ours. The palace of his father David was a perfect pandemonium of scheming and jealousy, and these coming to their climax in the vilest of crimes. It was in such surroundings that Absalom, David's third son by his third living wife, was born and brought up.

The Home of Absalom

When David was in the purity of his youth and kept his father's flock, he could sing, "The Lord is my Shepherd." And we are quite inclined to think of David, the "man after God's own heart," as wearing a royal crown and diverting himself from the cares of state by writing hymns for the ages, or, with rapt and uplifted face, playing the harp as an accompaniment to his devotions. But, alas! this was not always David's occupation! With prosperity, like many a man in our time, he forgot his God, and in the hour of his temptation fell so terribly that the calamity of it weighted him to his death. It is true of king, or president, or prophet or priest —"whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap." For, be he rich or poor, wise man or fool, "who soweth to the flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption."

Absalom's mother was the daughter of a heathen king, and this may have given him prestige among his brethren. He had his father's beauty of face and form. We often say of young men, but especially of young women, "their face is their fortune"; but it has often turned out to be their misfortune. It is from such a home and so circumstanced that Absalom steps forth to the gaze of men. Ambition asserts itself There are two others who stand between him and the throne. These must be gotten rid of.

We may pass over other crimes of Absalom to give our attention to the one which most concerns us. David was too indulgent a father. He cared for his children, but not with that devotion which led them to walk in the paths of virtue. Absalom, with his good looks and his pride and his jealousies, has great and almost overwhelming obstacles to face, and he shows no disposition to face them. He surrenders himself to the tides that sweep him on to his destruction. When his father the king went forth, he walked upon his way with few, or none, for his attendants; but when Absalom went forth, fifty outriders proclaimed his coming.

The Wayward Son

At last he will overthrow his own father, if only he may climb to his throne. In every community and city there are the dissatisfied and unhappy; those who feel that justice is not done them; and Absalom set his cap for the disaffected. At the gate of the city, where affairs were adjudicated, Absalom sat. When the poor fellah came in from the desert, instead of turning coldly from him, he ran toward him and greeted him as if he had been a long-lost brother. When any man thought himself aggrieved by any decision, Absalom said to him, "You have a fine case. If I were in the king's place, things would go your way." So he sought to make men his friends for his own purpose.

At last his scheme is perfected and the blow falls. Is there a sadder sight in history than the flight of David the king down over the brook Kedron and on into the Jordan Valley, fleeing from his son? We need take but a moment to remind you of that rebellion and its outcome. A few faithful men rallied to the old king's support. Joab leads the king's troops, and, fleeing before his victorious forces, Absalom the usurper is caught by the head in an oak tree, and Joab thrusts him through with his javelin. Afar off the king sits; anxious, not so much for his own army, nor for his own cause, as for the fate of his wayward son. His parting exhortation to his warriors had been, "Deal gently with the young man, even with Absalom." And now the fleet messenger is come to bring news of the battle to the king as he sits there waiting by the gate. The thought which is in his heart springs to the lips of the old king, and he says, "Is the young man Absalom safe?" With Oriental evasion the messenger answers: "All that rise up against thee be as that young man is!" At last the king knows the truth. His son, the rebel, is not safe. His life has gone out in defeat and shame. A great heap of stones is cast upon his body, and to this day every Jew who passes through the Valley of Jehosaphat stops to throw a stone at the monument, which is called "Absalom's Tomb." The principles of safety he had never followed, and how could he be safe? His father moans over him, "O Absalom, my son, my son! Would God I had died for thee!"

This is a story out of the long ago. But Longfellow sings with truth:

> There is no far nor near,
> There is no there nor here,
> There is neither soon nor late,
> In that chamber o'er the gate,
> Nor any long ago
> To that cry of human woe,
> O Absalom, my son!
> . . .
> Somewhere at every hour
> The watchman on the tower
> Looks forth, and sees the fleet
> Approach of the hurrying feet
> Of messengers that bear
> The tidings of despair,
> O Absalom, my son!

And so I cry, in the name of every father and every mother who has a wayward or careless boy, "Is the young man safe?"

Seeking the Husks

It requires no great prophet to tell a young man's future. Tell me the direction he is sailing and I will tell you where he will land. The story of Absalom is not the only story of young manhood which brings its lesson to us out of the old Book. There are two records, one in the Old Testament, and one in the New, that we may well consider. Here goes a young man down to Egypt. He goes as a slave. The unprincipled wife of his master tries in vain her wicked arts. Rather than yield, he goes to jail on a false accusation and lives there seven years. He will not compromise his soul. You remember how he mounts to the high places in Egypt, how that same Joseph becomes the prime minister of Pharaoh and the salvation of his family.

Eighteen hundred years after, the evangelists tell of a young man who leaves home under different circumstances. He is tired of his father's restraint. Perhaps some one has told him of the magnificence of Egypt, and he must see it. "This daily life on the hills of Judea is fit only for goatherders. Let me go to the culture and the joyous life of society." So the father gives him his money and he goes. The opening of the ball is magnificent. You have seen the artist's conception of it. The young man in the center, lifting high the glass, with the gayest youth of the capital around him; the smiles of dazzling beauties entrance him; the queen of the revelry makes him her own. The days and the nights go by in carousal. Occasionally a white face he left in Judea seems looking at him in the mazes of the dance, and he thinks of his broken promises, but he drowns them in the winecup. You do not fail to notice how the artist puts in the panel at the side the picture of that same youth with money gone and friends gone, the swineherd of a foreigner, eating the husks which the swine have left.

But this was in the olden time, and in other nations. We may change it to our time and to America. There is a youth running a humble pedler's cart. He is too large for his surroundings; his opportunities are limited. He goes to the city He is clerk and then partner in one of its great establishments. Little by little he goes on to violate the laws of common honesty, to laugh at the sanctity of marriage and to yield himself to the blandishments of evil, until at last in our own city he pays the price in blood and lies dead by the hand of an assassin at the age of thirty-seven. Let men who want to live a fast life on the White Way see the footprints of the men who walked that path before them.

There is another young man who ran something of the same round, who came from a different State, and after he had mastered still another business there, he came to put his hand upon the supply of a great city, and if what the financiers are telling us be true, he crushed out many a fortune. At last, prematurely old, he escapes the just punishment of his sins, through pity for his years and his infirmities.

A Good Start

There was another young man born on Cape Cod, coming at last to the metropolis of New England. You could see him in the daytime, running his wheelbarrow, and at night you would find him with a little company of those who loved and feared God, telling of the peace and blessedness of a Christian life. This young man mounts by the steps of virtue and thrift until he stands at the top, and founds a university, which is sending out thousands of men to profit by his life and by his example.

How are you starting, my young man? And, parents, are you sending out your children so that they will be safe amid the temptations of a great city? What ideals are you holding up before them and is your example an example for good, or for evil? Many of you came into the city from the quiet paths of country life. How has it been with you? Have you kept true to your ideals? Have you feared God and wrought righteousness? Or has your very abundance turned you away from God?

You are asking about what your children shall do; what their business shall be. You need to ask a different question. You are saying, Is the young man smart? There is a more important question: Is he safe? What constitutes the model young man? Not to play the part of a Chesterfield. Not to lie and swear and steal and drink, but to be virtuous and prayerful and true; to fear God and walk humbly before him. You walk in a slippery path, and unless you are careful your feet will take hold on death. "Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth, and let thy heart cheer thee in thy youth and walk in the ways of thy heart and in the sight of thy eyes; but know that for all these things God will bring thee into judgment." You see a deserted old man, and you say, Spare me from a life like that! But unless you are true, you are laying the foundations for it. He said, "I can get along without the Church of Christ and the Christian religion," but he could not do it and be safe.

The Responsibility

"Is the young man safe?" How can he be unless he walks in the paths of safety? Against him are the saloon and temptations to falsehood and impurity and bad associates. Within are evil desires, weaknesses, inherited tendencies, the tiger and the lion of his animal nature. He must have help from somewhere. There is only one source. It is "He who is able to save unto the uttermost all who come unto God by him." So the question is not, Are you smart? but, Are you safe? Not, Are you rich? but, Is it well with you? The smarter the man, the greater risk he runs; the richer the man, the more susceptible he is to temptation.

You are looking after the education of your son, after business for him. You choose your occupation or dwelling-place with deliberation and care, but the greatest question is, Where will you and the children be safe, and how will you be safe? Settle that first. Others as strong as you have been wrecked. Take on board the Pilot. He has sounded all the depths, and he has the only chart for the waters over which you are sailing.

AFTER THE STORM

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

HE earth may be dark and gloomy,
And the clouds may hang bleak and gray:
d the lightning may tear the sky apart
While the storm gods have their day.
d earth's creatures frightened, panting,
Torn with their sorrow and pain,
rget that there is to-morrow—
That the sun comes after the rain.

e night may be black and heartless,
And sorrow may be around;
d the prayers may seem all unanswered,
As we kneel on the friendless ground.
d we sob and sigh in our anguish,
For we fail to see the light;
! God, if we could remember,
That the dawn comes after the night!

Skim-Milk Character

KIM-MILK ain't a wholesome dish for anybody," declared Mrs. Brown s she glanced scornfully at a pan of ilk whose golden cream she had just emoved. "And each day," she connued, "I pray: O Lord, keep me om being a skim-milk character."

Wise Mrs. Brown, for she realized e truth of the old saying that charcter is power. It is not only power, ut is also unlimited energy, and as a agnet attracts, so also does charac-
r. Noble thoughts and deeds always all up the sleeping nobleness in oth-
rs. So the soul possessed of a vision f its immortal destiny inspires all hose with whom it comes in contact.
he person who veers like a weather-ock to every point of the compass, lown by his caprices, accomplishes othing, and is indeed a skim-milk haracter. Charles Sumner gave the hree essentials to success as follows:
First, backbone; second, backbone;
hird, backbone."

A portrait of the antithesis of a kim-milk character is beautifully llustrated in a story of Ziethen, one f the leading generals in the army of rederick the Great. He had grown ray in the king's service, and because f faithfulness stood high in his ajesty's favor. At a court dinner the ing, an infidel, turned to his favorite eneral and in a sneering tone re-erred to his absence from a court unction a few days previous in order o attend a communion service, saying:
Well, my good Ziethen, how did the acrament digest?"

The veteran general arose and with courage finer than that displayed pon battlefields replied with simple ignity: "Your majesty knows that often have I risked my life to save ours, and I stand ready to do it gain, but your majesty does wrong to reat the Christian religion with dis-espect. You owe to it the safety of our throne. You must pardon an old ervant who cannot bear in silence any light to his Lord and Saviour."

The king with cheeks flushed with hame responded: "My brave Ziethen, ou shall be disturbed no more." Thus "regal consciousness" always calls ut the hidden nobility in another.

IN THE COLLEGE HALLS OF ENGLAND

BY CLAYTON SEDGWICK COOPER

IT IS not easy for an American to state his impressions of three months among institutions where, instead of education à la carte, it is most decidedly table d' hôte, and one is bathed in memories

Of windows and chapels and halls,
And scholars in surplice and gown,
Of time-eaten towns, and moldering walls,
And legends as old as the town.

To find colleges of two hundred students or less taking the place of "fraternities," public schoolmasters following Dr. Arnold's example of living with their boys; the classics taking the precedence of "bread and butter studies," English reserve in the place of American expressiveness; to see Oxford and Cambridge men fined for being outside the college gates after ten o'clock, and to find virtually every English schoolboy engaging in some form of athletic exercise, contrast decidedly with American student life and work.

IN MY work with English schools, I began with elementary education, which enrolls 900,000 children in London alone; proceeding to the central schools, where trades and technical education is given; to the preparatory schools, resembling our American high schools—then passing to the big public schools like Eton, Harrow and Rugby, finishing with the old universities of Oxford and Cambridge, and the new universities like Manchester, Leeds and Birmingham.

Among the trade schools under the supervision of the London County Council, I was impressed with the individual independence afforded to the teachers, quite in contrast with that which I found in Germany, where, if one knows the subject being taught and how it is taught in one school, he knows the subject and method of teaching in every like school in the empire.

My chief time was spent in the public schools and universities. "Is it a public school?" I asked of a certain business man in England. "Oh, yes," he replied; "it is a real public school, for the students don't learn anything there." This answer was made possible because the public schools, where the flower of the English youth are educated for seven or more years, stress life and character more than books. "To train boys to learn to live with other men," said one schoolmaster, "is our object." It is here that English statesmen and colonizers have been made; it is on the playing fields of these schools that Wellington said the battle of Waterloo was fought and won. The institutions have partial counterparts in our country in such schools as Lawrenceville and Groton. They are distinctive throughout the world in their training of students in self-government, self-reliance, and resourcefulness. Even the fagging system, still a great leveler in English schools, is a feature of this self-governing responsibility given to students. "To play the game" is the watchword. The only schoolmaster whom I remember seeing in anger was one who was told by one of his boys that he was unfair. "You may say that I do not know my subject," said the master hotly, "or that I cannot teach it, but you must not call me unfair. It is the worst insult you can offer me." This spirit of fairness taught in the public schools of England has been carried to every British colony, until to-day England is a synonym for justice to the fellaheen of Egypt as to the Hindu coolie of India.

IN RELIGIOUS training American student-led religion is clearly ahead of England. In short, as one master at Harrow said to me, "There is no such thing as religious training in the English public schools." To be sure there are "prayers," also the Anglican Church services, for these are prescribed by Parliament. The Bible is also in the curriculum, and is read without comment in virtually all of the grade schools. There is, however, little voluntary student religious activity. Missions for the poor are carried on largely by proxy, salaried officers conducting the work, which is reported to the student body which supports it. There are no thousands of students studying the Bible in their rooms as in America. I found nothing that even faintly resembled the St. Luke Society at Hotchkiss or the Dwight Hall work at Yale, or the Christian Association activity at the University of Michigan.

The English student refuses to be organized religiously and is loath to give any informal expression to his religious convictions. Ecclesiastically, he is more religious than the Continental student, but the drift here, as on the Continent, is distinctly away from church religion in its traditional forms.

WHATEVER criticism I may have to present against the English school system, I am leaving England with somewhat the same conviction as was expressed by a certain publicist, who said of the British Constitution, "The most wonderful thing about it is that it works."

After a brief time among the schools and students of France, I am now facing eastward, sailing for India December 1. I expect to arrive in America next September, and soon after to begin a lecture tour among educational institutions in which I shall try to present in illustrated form some of the results of two years' investigation and work among students of many lands.

THE QUEST

AMID the giddy throng
I sought for Christ the Lord
To fill my soul's vast need;
Alas! I found him not.
Sadly I turned away.
And then, where crowned heads
And sceptered hands held sway,
I sought. He was not there!
In haste I bent my steps
Toward vaults where glittered gems
And precious things of gold,
Dug out from deepest dark
Of grim old mountainside,
And pure, translucent pearls
From ocean caves deep down,
Where mermaids sing, and flash
Their amber combs in glee
Through waves of shining hair.
Methought such setting bright
Would best become the Christ,
High Heaven's majestic Son.
From out the viewless air,
A voice: "Not there! not there!
I'll guide you to the Lord."

With listening ear, intent,
I followed with swift feet
My guide invisible
Through long, dark ways, unknown,
Where sickness, want and care
Held sway. Behold my Lord,
Holding with loving hand
A draught of water pure
To fevered lips; while words
Of peace and comfort flowed
To bless the struggling soul
About to take its flight.
Then turned himself about,
Where little children cried
For mother-love and bread;
Lifted them tenderly
And kissed away their tears;
Drew forth his scanty store
Of crusts, and gave them all!
Then, silent, went away.
Mid sobs and tears I cried:
"I've found my blessed Lord!"
Yea, thou art he of whom
The prophets wrote and spake;
Jesus, the Christ of God!"

Famine in Africa

FAMINE is being experienced at Inhambane, Africa. A territory 350 miles by 250 miles, with a population of at least two millions, is involved. Parents are driving their children from their homes because they do not wish to see them die, and also because they hope that in some way they may get food for one or two when it would be impossible to obtain food for more. Children, old men and women, and mothers with their babies, are coming in scores to the mission each day, pleading for something to eat. Already many are so weak that they fall by the roadside and die; some die at the mission door and the missionaries have to bury them. The sufferers have sold all that they possess in order to have money to buy food, which can scarcely be had in any part of the district. Where peanuts can be bought the traders are charging $5 for five gallons of unshelled peanuts, and $8 for three and one half bushels of corn, and ten times the usual price for rice.

The Montenegrin

THE Montenegrin is a survival of the Middle Ages. When he fights the infidel he is animated by the fanatic zeal that emulates the Crusaders—to him it is a "holy war" of righteous vengeance. Curious anomaly, he calls himself a Christian, glories in his religion, but practically he knows nothing of the Christian dispensation. His religion is that of the Old Testament. He would never dream of a brotherhood of man that included the Turk.

Second only to their religion is their love for king and country. I have seen men stoop and kiss the ground when they crossed the border after long absence from their fatherland. Nor can you wonder at their passionate pride of race when you recall history and remember that at the disruption of the old Servian kingdom a mere handful of Servians found safety among the eagles and beasts of prey in the dreary solitudes of the Black Mountains, and from these fastnesses have ever kept the Turk at bay, fighting against overwhelming odds.—London Daily Mail.

WHAT BECAME OF THE CLIFF DWELLERS

BY JOHN L. COWAN

AT LAST it appears that two of the most puzzling riddles of the Southwest have been solved. The first is, What became of the Cliff Dwellers? The second is, Whence came the Pueblo Indians?

Some ethnologists have insisted that the Pueblos are the direct descendants of the Cliff Dwellers, inheriting their language, religion, culture and industries, and differing from their ancestors only in the location of their homes. Others have been just as confident that the Cliff Dwellers are an extinct people; that they have vanished utterly from the face of the earth, leaving not a human trace behind, with the exception of their deserted homes, a few bones and desiccated mummies, some pottery and trinkets. Neither of these extreme views, it now appears, is correct. The truth is found in a middle ground. The Cliff Dwellers, as a racial type, are extinct, and their language forgotten; but a strain of their blood remains in the modern Pueblos. And the Pueblos, it is reasonably certain, are a composite race formed by the amalgamation of the ancient Cliff Dwellers with stronger nomadic tribes which conquered them, intermarried with them, and then, to a large extent, assimilated their culture.

Spruce Tree House, Showing the Overhanging Cliff

This opinion was advanced and strongly supported with indirect evidence by Dr. Edgar L. Hewett several years ago. It has lately received confirmation that appears to remove it from the domain of conjecture into the realm of fact.

For years past Dr. Hewett has from time to time conducted excavations among the numberless prehistoric ruins west of Santa Fe. By measurement of the skulls found in the course of these excavations he has proven that the Cliff Dwellers were a dolicocephalic (long-headed) race. The Pueblo Indians are predominantly brachycephalic (short-headed) with a noticeable percentage (from 15 to 25 per cent.) of the other type. The difference between the two types is fundamental and proves conclusively that the Pueblos differ widely from the ancient people of the cliffs. Nevertheless the similarity of their architecture, their industries, their culture and their religion unmistakably indicates that the Pueblos are the inheritors of the institutions of the vanished race. Some of the existing communities even possess traditions to the effect that their ancestors dwelt in the cliff homes. All these circumstances led to the conjecture that at some remote period in the past the people of the cliffs have been conquered by a more warlike people; and that the modern Pueblos represented the amalgamation of the victors and the vanquished.

This view has recently received strong confirmation by the discovery that what is known as the Tewa or Tanoan dialect of the Pueblos (spoken by the inhabitants of twelve of the existing villages, including Taos, Santa Clara, San Juan and Isleta) is strikingly similar to the language spoken by the Kiowas of the Great Plains. Throughout historic times the two tribes have been separated by a thousand miles of trackless desert. The evidence of a common origin is beyond question. The conclusion is irresistible that long before Coronado made his historic journey of exploration through the Southwest, a mighty war party of the Kiowas crossed the Great Plains and entered the wonderful region of cliffs and cañons and flat-topped mesas just west of the Rio Grande, which we call Pajarito Park. Here they found the people whom we call the "Cliff Dwellers," although it is probable that the cliff dwellings had been deserted for centuries, and that the entire population lived in the great communal houses on the mesas. A fight was inevitable—doubtless many fights; but in the end the nomads of the plains vanquished the peaceful agricultural tribe whose territories they had invaded.

But this was a goodly land in which the conquerors found themselves—a land in which commodious and easily defended homes were ready for occupancy, thanks to the industry of the conquered people; a land that yielded abundant crops of corn, beans and squash—else so great a population could not have subsisted. So the conquerors decided to stay. Just what happened we can only guess. Being savages, it is likely that the victors killed all the men and the old and ugly women, and married the comely squaws. Possibly the men who ceased to fight were spared, but that intermarriage took place the Pueblos of to-day are living witnesses. That the ancient cliff-dwelling stock narrowly escaped annihilation is proven by the predominance of the Kiowan skull in the modern Pueblo communities. Nowhere does the percentage of long-headed people (the Cliff-Dweller type) rise higher than 25 per cent.

This, in brief, is what the latest scientific research teaches us in regard to the Cliff Dwellers of the Pajarito Park region, and the Pueblos of what has been called the Tanoan stock. The newly established Museum of New Mexico, under the direction of Dr. Hewett, is carrying on extensive excavations in that interesting region and will no doubt add greatly to existing knowledge. The field for research is a vast one, the abandoned homes in the cliffs being numbered literally by the tens of thousands. Here is territory more than five hundred square miles in extent, covered with hundreds of feet of volcanic tufa, ejected from the cones of the Jemez Mountains. Through this the intermittent streams and torrents, making their way from the mountains to the Rio Grande, cut deep cañons with almost vertical walls. By the action of the winds and waters recesses were worn in the cliffs. The earliest type of cliff dwelling found in the region (and structurally the most primitive homes of men yet discovered in America) were made by simply enlarging these natural cavities. Next came the homes formed by excavating wholly artificial caves; the building of front walls of masonry; the building of front and side walls of masonry, with the rear wall formed by the cliff; and finally the climax of aboriginal architecture in great communal houses on the mesa tops, in the terraced pyramidal form seen in its perfection in the existing Pueblo communal dwellings at Taos.

Part of the Cliff Palace, Showing Round and Square Towers

It is evident that the evolution of culture represented by the growth of architecture from rude holes in the rocks to the great communal dwellings on the mesas must have required many centuries—perhaps thousands of years. Archeologically, then, the Pajarito Park region is unsurpassed in interest in the world, on account of the light that scientific investigation of the numberless ruins may shed upon the numerous vexed questions connected with the beginning and growth of culture.

The Pajarito Park cliff and mesa ruins are the most numerous and extensive found in the Southwest; but other prehistoric remains known as cliff ruins are scattered widely throughout that region. It is probable that the numerous primitive tribes that occupied these met with a fate similar to that of the ancient Pajaritans—conquest by and amalgamation with more warlike nomadic tribes.

The most spectacular prehistoric ruins in the Southwest, and the most remarkable cliff ruins in the world, are located in the newly created Mesa Verde National Park in southwestern Colorado. The two largest ruins, known as the "Cliff Palace" and the "Spruce Tree House," have been excavated and repaired by Dr. J. W. Fewkes, of the Smithsonian Institution. His investigations seem to indicate that the ancient inhabitants of the Mesa Verde too were conquered and assimilated.

Dr. Fewkes has labored off and on for years among the Hopis of northern Arizona. From the beginning of his investigations of the Cliff Palace and the Spruce Tree House, he was struck by the similarity of the architecture, the arrangement of the "kivas" (or places of worship and council), the household utensils and articles of adornment and of ceremonial use, to those employed at the present day among the Hopis. Even the most superficial investigation indicates unmistakably a close relationship between the Hopis and the vanished tribe.

The Hopis speak a Shoshonean dialect; but mingled with it are numerous archaic terms and forms found in no other Indian tongue. This, no doubt, represents all that remains of the otherwise forgotten language of the people of the Mesa Verde. The Hopis are the smallest in stature of existing tribes found within the borders of the United States—another heritage from the Cliff Dwellers—for skeletons that have been exhumed prove that these were a diminutive people.

It seems plain, then, that the prehistoric tribe of the Mesa Verde was conquered by a people of the Shoshonean stock; and that by subsequent intermarriage the identity of both tribes was lost. It is possible, or rather probable, that the Hopis more nearly approximate the conquered Cliff Dwellers than the conquering nomads. It is certain that they are the nearest approximation to an ancient cliff-dwelling tribe that now survives.

The Toro Point Breakwater

THE BUILDERS OF THE PANAMA CANAL

The government has planted settlements and provided for their population, and while it has not exactly put a premium on marriage, it has so furthered the comfort of the married man and his family that many a bachelor has turned into a benedict and brought his young bride to the Canal Zone to learn housekeeping under unique circumstances. There are schools, churches, clubhouses, recreation halls, tennis courts and baseball diamonds; doctors and medicine, hospitals, and rest camps. With the co-operation of Uncle Sam, women's clubs flourish, fraternal orders and their auxiliaries thrive, Boy Scouts and Campfire Girls work for honors, church societies, guilds, auxiliaries, and active missionary societies all go to emphasize the fact that this great work is being accomplished by a Christian people.

CRASH, bang — bang — bang — bang bang!" The sound went crashing down the reverberating hills. I sprang from my chair in alarm. The woman next me laid her hand on my arm and whispered:

"It's all right. Only a dobey shot in the Cut. It must be five o'clock."

Her tone was so reassuring that I settled back in my seat, although I had not the least idea what a "dobey shot" was, nor when it would go off again.

There was a perceptible movement among the women in the room; a gentle flutter as of birds preparing for flight. Anxious glances were cast toward the open door. The speaker seemed suddenly to have come to the end of her address and brought it to an abrupt close. The presiding officer arose, and, in shorter order than I had ever seen it done before, declared the meeting adjourned. No sooner were the last words uttered than fifty women arose and left the building.

"They are going home," explained my monitor, "to get supper, most of them. You see, the work stops at five o'clock, and nearly all of these women are their own housekeepers. Half past five is the usual supper hour, and they like to get through early so as to have a long evening. They go to bed early, too. We all keep early hours here."

We stood at the door and watched the crowds of women in the fresh, crisp, white dresses moving along the sunlit street. Other women were out too; some were pushing baby carriages; others carried large bundles and hurried out of the long, low building, which I was told was the commissary, or general store. The women walked up the broad board walk toward the shady sabanas where their homes were, scattered over the grass and shaded with palms and cocoanut trees.

As we watched, the street suddenly became alive with men; they came up out of the cut, from the shops, and from the offices on the hill just beyond. Some of these men wore the laborer's blue working shirt and were covered with a generous sprinkling of oil; others were in khaki, their broad-brimmed felt hats pulled low down to shade their tanned faces; others appeared in conventional office suits—these men were paler than those in the "field service." Many of the men joined the women and walked with them, taking a hand with the baby carriage or the bundles. They were seemingly unaware of the discrepancies in their toil-stained appearance and that of their carefully dressed partners. Some entered the commissary and emerged later with bundles and packages. They have the exclusive privilege of the commissary stores after working hours, and families must see to it that their marketing is done at another time.

From the point of view of an American, and excepting the scattering element of foreign laborers who straggled along with the others—blacks, Italians, Spanish, low-statured native Panamans and swart Hindus in their graceful native headdress—this village might have been a suburb of almost any city in the United States in the summer. Nor was there evidence of the temporary character of the life of the community. There was nothing to indicate that the village looked back upon an existence of less than six years and forward to an existence of not more than two years.

One must be struck with the magnitude of the work; the ease with which every difficulty, large or trifling, is met and overcome; the subjugation, as it seems, of the grim destroyer itself, in the sanitation of the tropics; but all this is as nothing compared to the realization of the human power behind the work, the personal equation and the plant that has made it possible for five thousand American men and their families to live in comfort and happiness two thousand miles by sea from—the butter for their tables. This is the part that haunts the memory long after the scenes in Culebra Cut have become a blur to the lay mind.

It is well to remember that three qualities have made possible the digging of the Panama Canal; first, the sanitation by United States army officers under Colonel Gorgas and his staff of skilled sanitary engineers; second, the skill of the engineers who have applied every part of their knowledge in working out problems on a greater scale than has ever been done before; and thirdly, the humanizing force of a government that could conceive and carry out the high ideal of planting a life for the canal-builders where they could work under liberal conditions, losing neither part nor lot in their heritage of freedom and happiness. Of these three factors there is no first nor last; they are co-equal.

The canal force as it stands to-day, and has stood for the past five years, is a body of picked men; a force the like of which has never before been gathered for any similar work. As men, they are loyal, contented, and happy. And certainly they are healthy. The first requisite for appointment on the canal work is a clean bill of health. This having been assured and the appointment given, from that moment the health of the man or woman in the service is a matter of the greatest concern to the government. Every employee is entitled to thirty days' sick leave, in addition to his forty-two days' vacation leave. He is cared for while ill by a district physician, medicines being provided; or he is sent to one of the hospitals until he recovers. This care is not "free"; it is a part of the employee's pay just as much as his monthly money wage. It is one of the government's ways of maintaining the highest health conditions in the force.

The second quality for obtaining efficiency of the canal force has been whimsically expressed in two words: "Colonel Goethals"; and it must not be mistaken for hero-worship when I say that this is approximately true. The chairman and chief engineer of the Isthmian Canal Commission adds to his recognized ability as engineer of the highest rank a most noteworthy quality as an organizer and leader of men. In appearance, Colonel Goethals is a tall straight figure, every inch a soldier, although he is never seen in uniform. He is the most autocratic ruler in the world. A Czar of Russia might well envy his estate, and an Emperor of Germany wish that within his glove he held a hand so truly iron. He is the soul of honor, straightforward, true, and just. And the canal workers trust him.

"Why don't you take the matter into court? You have a clear case," a man was heard to say.

"Court be hanged!" was the reply; "I'll take it to the Colonel; he's court enough for me."

With such a leader it is easy to imagine what the morale of the force under him must be. Investigate as you will, you will find that the standard in the Canal Zone is high. Members of the judiciary affirm that the average amount of crime in the Canal Zone is surprisingly low. Five years ago Bishop Knight, missionary bishop of the Episcopal Church in Cuba, said that he was impressed with the character of the men engaged in the canal work. Picked men he found them, of unusual strength and physical development. "It is generally found," he said, "that in a rush of people to a new territory the predominating element is a rough one, and the fact that the better class of Americans is attracted to the Isthmus gives assurance that the work undertaken will be carried on to a successful issue."

It is this high conception of transplanted American community life that called forth both the admiration and criticism of a British writer some time ago. He said that, while the ideal of the American Government was to transplant community life to the isthmus, it had only partially succeeded, as that community life is a matter of slow development, and while the canal-builders' villages have all the outward appearance of American settlements, they lacked the inward spirit that comes only of slow growth and long-treasured traditions. There is a lack of cliques; there are not enough of any one industrial, religious or social class to form such. "But," he goes on to say, "they have better than that; there has arisen a society whose standards are high and whose members, unaccustomed to many of its ideas, are caught in the whirlwind of new ideals and standards that threatens to take them off their feet."

The spiritual wants of the builders are supplied by the maintenance of chaplains of the various denominations; the family life, by the establishment of a public school system which is modeled after the most approved system in the United States; the social requirements are met by encouraging and forwarding the work of clubs and societies. Healthful athletic exercise is encouraged in the clubhouses, at each one of which is employed a physical director. These clubhouses are the great recreation centers of the men and women alike. They provide legitimate entertainment, such as reading in a room liberally supplied with newspapers and periodicals, entertainments of various kinds, music, singing clubs, besides the athletic department. They are the scenes of the community Christmas celebrations, school entertainments, and carnivals, of lively debates and serious addresses.

One of the effects of the life of the American people on the isthmus has been the development of a new type—the "Zone-American." First, this type will be identified by its sterling moral character; then, by its independence, greater even than the independence of the average American. The melting together of different standards of life has taught many of the Zone-American families that the fine art of living is to be found in the home and in the family circle, rather than in the false life that seems so attractive in the great American cities "back home."

OUR EDITORIAL FORUM

The "Light of the World"

ONE of the most distinguished of living scientists is Dr. Alfred Russel Wallace of London, who lately celebrated his ninetieth birthday. On that occasion he gave an interview to the London Daily News in which he is represented as taking a decidedly gloomy view of the present condition of human society. He says man to day is master of a great accumulation of human knowledge, yet he is no whit cleverer than the ancients. The pyramid-builders were quite as good mathematicians as Newton. In morals and intellect, the race has been stationary these thousands of years. He condemns our social environment, our dishonest business methods and our child-labor system, the widespread prevalence of vice, the wholesale adulteration of the commodities of life, and the failure to find remedies for horrors and diseases unknown before. Still, he finds hope at the bottom of the cup, and he believes the improvement will come through natural selection.

If this morbid picture were true, ours would be a sad old world indeed. But it is, fortunately, only one side of the picture over which the aged scientist has expended his criticism. We have a better world than the ancients ever had morally, socially, physically and spiritually. Paganism has almost disappeared from the face of the earth. In the last two thousand years the "world's hope" has illuminated every land, and Christianity, from a little group of people in Syria, has grown to 480,000,000. Despotisms have well nigh gone, slavery is a thing of the past, human kindness has built tens of thousands of hospitals, and very nearly one half the world is helping the other half to better living. Even the worst of our cities are purer and better governed than those of the ancients. We have better sanitation and better skill in fighting disease; death-rates are being reduced, human suffering alleviated, and human life lengthened. Commercially and industrially we are making reforms which in the end will tell for man's welfare.

Dr. Wallace seems to have missed the keynote. It is Christianity and the love of humanity which it inculcates that is lifting the whole human race. Before the star shone over Bethlehem, civilizations rose and fell and the race as a whole seemed to move in vast aimless cycles. Wherever Christ is preached, civilization no longer droops and dies but goes forward. He gave to the world the motif of life, and wherever his Gospel has penetrated it has fulfilled his promise, "I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto myself."

The Catholic Press Revolt

IN THESE days, when the Church of Rome is passing through purgatorial fires of popular condemnation as the result of its campaign to "make America Catholic," it is interesting to note that not all Catholic journals yield approval to the political aims and aspirations of the Vatican. There are to be found here and there publications which, while giving loyal adherence to the tenets of that church, look askance at the dangerous enterprise upon which it has lately entered for temporal rehabilitation. Others are discreetly silent. Strangely enough, a revolt in the Catholic press of Italy has occurred recently, in which five newspapers, the Corriere d' Italia, the Corriere di Sicilia, the Momento, the Italia and the Avenire, have shown their disapproval of the efforts being made to restore the temporal power of the Pope in that country. We learn from the Catholic Bulletin of St. Paul, Minn., that those journals have shown "indifference toward the temporal power of the Pope and have refused, up to the present time, to advocate vigorously the cause of the independence of the Holy Father, and to carry out his instructions in regard to the public actions of Italian Catholics." Here we would ask our readers to remember that we are quoting the language of a Catholic journal. The five newspapers in question, having been "condemned" by the Holy See for their disloyal attitude toward the temporal power policy, have issued a statement expressing unlimited respect for and unconditional obedience to ecclesiastical authority, "but not explicitly promising a formal acceptance of the papal policy." This is extremely interesting in view of the eagerness of certain American Catholic journals to disclaim any desire on the part of the Vatican for recognition here of the temporal power; indeed, coming from Catholic sources, as we have said, it is a complete refutation of their denials. Commenting on the case of the Italian papers, the London Tablet, one of the leading Catholic journals in Europe, observes:

> All these papers profess and claim the title of Catholic—but, on the other hand, they reserve to themselves the right of freedom from ecclesiastical control, and they do not give all that attention to the official Catholic movement in Italy and that enthusiastic adhesion to the directions (not merely religious directions) of the Holy See, which the Holy See expects from thoroughly Catholic newspapers. Thus the Holy Father himself has declared that such lukewarm papers are in reality worse than the more or less Anticlerical organs.

It is evident that no Catholic journal in Europe, however loyal in purely ecclesiastical matters, can hope to preserve a shred of its independence in politics unless it breaks with the Vatican.

As the great question now before the American people hinges on the efforts that are being openly made in this republic to secure political ascendancy for the Roman Church, this Italian episode is especially instructive. Back of and underneath all its spiritual professions, the Roman Church cherishes the dream of temporal power. This has been so apparent here that all of the great Protestant denominations have sounded a clear note of warning. Occasionally we find in Catholic journals a faint disclaimer of such a purpose, inspired doubtless by the fear that the pace cut out by the American hierarchy has been recklessly fast and unwisely aggressive. But the denial loses its force when set side by side with the evidence. We have seen Catholic prelates seated on thrones, Catholic cardinals demanding recognition due to "princes of the blood"; Catholics revising our national history for their own purposes; Catholics attacking our public schools as godless and nurseries of crime; a cardinal receiving the military escort and attentions due to high government officials or visiting potentates; Catholics scheming for political power and place; and Catholics boasting that the United States was destined to become the "first Catholic nation of the world." Now we read in the Western Watchman of January 2, 1913, Father Phelan's characteristically frank declaration that "all states in Christendom must, if necessary, give up and surrender their material interests, when the superior claims of religion are involved [meaning, of course, the Roman religion], and that the Church [of Rome] is a divine monarchy and its absolutism is second only to the absolutism of God." This is precisely in line with the famous passage in the bull Unam Sanctam, which declares that "it is altogether necessary to salvation for every human creature to be subject to the Roman Pontiff."

In an age of freedom and enlightenment, such things are strangely out of place. While Rome has stood still, the whole world has been going forward. The revolt of the Catholic press in Italy is a significant sign of the times—an indication of the great change that is coming over many adherents of that faith, who are wearied of the reiterated claims of the Vatican to be the sole judge, arbiter and ruler in the affairs of the universe.

Prophet Joseph Smith's Inspiration

SEVENTY years have passed since Joseph Smith, "prophet, seer and revelator," founded the Mormon religion and announced to the world the "divine gift" of the Mormon Scriptures. One of the prophet's books, The Pearl of Great Price which contains a number of hieroglyphic illustrations, held in great reverence by his followers, has recently come under the special scrutiny of several eminent Egyptologists in England, Germany and the United States, with the surprising result that, according to an article in the New York Times of December 29, 1912, they agree in the main that the hieroglyphics in the Mormon prophet's book are neither more nor less than copies from Egyptian originals, and that the translations he has given are largely a work of the imagination. All the facts developed during this remarkable inquiry are now being arranged. While it is true that ours is a land where many vagaries of so-called religious belief are tolerated, it will be strange indeed, in the event of the promised evidence being conclusive, if all of Joseph Smith's revelations, including the golden plates, should not be repudiated. Of course, the Mormon leaders pronounce the so-called "discoveries" inconclusive, and ask their people to withhold judgment. One of the surprising things about the case is that, in view of the great progress in Egyptian research during the last twenty-five years, the origin of the mysterious Mormon hieroglyphs was not discovered earlier.

The Growth of Missions

IF THE adverse critics of foreign missions will take the time to study the very instructive series of statistical tables compiled by the Missionary Review of the World, we do not see how they can escape the conviction that missionary work is constantly growing, is progressive, and is, besides, one of the very greatest agencies for the world's enlightenment. Far from languishing, the missionary army marches steadily ahead, occupying new fields and bringing in new converts every year. That 1912 gave a decided impetus to mission work throughout the world these figures show:

	1911	1912
Home income of foreign missionary societies	$25,297,074	$30,404,401
Income from the foreign fields	5,519,174	7,902,256
Protestant missionaries in the field	22,058	24,092
Native workers	88,309	111,982
Communicants	2,304,318	2,644,170
Total adherents, including communicants	4,875,454	6,055,425
Added last year, adults and children (Incomplete)	152,216	212,635

We have reason for thankfulness that in missionary enterprise our own land leads all others, both in gifts and in the number of workers. Here are the figures:

Home income in U. S. for foreign missions	$14,942,523
Income from the field	3,641,585
Foreign missionaries	8,037
Native helpers	37,951
Total American missionary forces	45,988
Communicants	781,454
Added last year	74,568

General Notes

—REV. L. G. LAUDENBERGER, St. Louis, Mo., writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, relative to the widely circulated report that Strindberg, the great Swedish author, had returned at the close of his life to the faith of his parents. Pastor Laudenberger quotes Dr. Axel Lindeberg of Minneapolis as authority for the statement that "Strindberg was led back to Christ and Christianity through Swedenborg," and was an earnest Swedenborgian at the time of his death.

—ON JANUARY 5 PRESIDENT TAFT expressed his willingness to submit the question at issue between the United States and Great Britain in the matter of Panama Canal tolls to a special court of arbitration. He is unwilling that the controversy be taken to The Hague, because other European countries are interested in the subject of the canal tolls, and would be inclined to take sides with England. General satisfaction was expressed in Great Britain at the President's declaration.

Ambassador Reid's Funeral

THE British cruiser Natal brought the body of Whitelaw Reid, American ambassador to Great Britain, to his native land, and the funeral was held at the Cathedral of St. John the Divine in New York City on the morning of January 5. The cathedral was full of those admitted by ticket, and thousands stood on the grounds outside. It was one of the most memorable funerals in the city's history. Sailors and marines from the dreadnoughts Florida and North Dakota formed a line of blue from the Amsterdam Avenue gates to the door of the cathedral. Near the One Hundred and Tenth Street gate an artillery caisson, drawn by six bay horses, waited to carry the coffin to the Grand Central Station on its way to the Sleepy Hollow Cemetery at Tarrytown for burial. Among the many beautiful floral pieces were those from President Taft, President Taft's cabinet, the staff of the New York Tribune, the officers of the Natal, the Delta Kappa Epsilon Fraternity, J. Pierpont Morgan, and Colonel and Mrs. Roosevelt. President Taft, accompanied by Secretary Hilles and Major Thomas L. Rhoads, his military aid, arrived at the cathedral a few minutes before eleven o'clock. He sat in the chancel, facing the chairs occupied by Mrs. Reid, Ogden Mills Reid and other members of the ambassador's family. In the chancel and on the same side as Mrs. Reid and her family were Colonel and Mrs. Roosevelt, and behind Mrs. Reid sat Mr. and Mrs. Henry Taft. Near President Taft was Colonel Lowther, in a brilliant artillery uniform. He represented the Duke of Connaught, brother of King George and Governor General of Canada. Near President Taft sat the honorary pallbearers. The pallbearers in the order in which they preceded the coffin into and out of the cathedral were: Secretary of State Knox, who walked with James Bryce, the British ambassador; Senator Elihu Root and Senator Henry Cabot Lodge, Judge George Gray of Delaware and Rear Admiral William Sheffield Cowles, U. S. N.; Hart Lyman and Donald Nicholson, Joseph H. Choate and J. Pierpont Morgan, Robert Bacon and ex-Senator Chauncey M. Depew, William Douglas Sloane and Robert Tod Lincoln, John Cadwalader and Henry White. The lesson of the day was read by Dean Grosvenor of the cathedral. The creed and prayers were read by Bishop Leonard of Cleveland and Bishop Greer, and Right Rev. William Boyd Carpenter, formerly Bishop of Ripon, now canon of Westminster, represented the Church of England at the service. The musical program consisted of Mendelssohn's Funeral March, and Sullivan's anthem, "The Light of the World." And thus was buried with the love and honor of two continents the American who was brilliant of intellect, deep in his affection, incorruptible in his integrity, firm in his religious faith, indomitable in his industry, who had worked his way up to the top of the ladder in his profession and nation, and had so wisely and loyally served his country as an ambassador to the Court of St. James, and has passed into the palace of the King. An old worthy died in a foreign land, and made his son promise to take him back to his homeland for burial.

My father made me swear, saying, Lo, I die: in my grave which I have digged for me in the land of Canaan, there shall thou bury me. . . . And Pharaoh said, Go up, and bury thy father. (Gen. 50: 5, 6.)

Slaughter of Workmen

ACCORDING to the latest Review of the American Association for Labor Legislation, there are 43,000 working people killed in industrial accidents in the United States, and 23,000,000 more persons are injured. The first step in the program for 1913 is to have laws enacted requiring prompt reports of all such accidents and diseases. Eight States have already passed such laws. The next step will be in the direction of limiting the hours of service. Sixteen States have no limitation of hours. In eighteen States the limits are only from sixty to seventy hours. The courts of Washington and California have upheld the eight-hour law. Colorado has established an eight-hour day. The prevention of lead poisoning is determined upon by the recommendation of methods effective in England, Germany, and Illinois. The chief determination of the association is to enact and enforce a "one-day rest in seven" law. The fifty-two days of rest in Switzerland is agreed to have reduced accidents due to the fault of railroad employees by 58 per cent., and prevented bodily injuries by 72 per cent. Thus the industrial world is emphasizing the temporal advantage of obedience to God's command:

Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy. (Ex. 20: 8.)

Right Was Wrong Side

IN NEW YORK CITY the other day, Michael Manning, a laborer thirty-two years of age, was taken to the Bellevue Hospital with pneumonia, from which he died. The autopsy revealed the fact that his heart was on the right side, his spleen also on the right side, his appendix on the left side, and that the lungs had two lobes each. Strange to say, Manning, though malformed, was able to do his full share of hard work without any apparent disability. While it is expected that the physical heart will be on the left side, it is all important that the spiritual heart should be on the right side; on the side of righteousness and love for God and men. The heart, figuratively as well as actually, is the fountain sending out the currents of life. The wise man recognizes the relation of the affections to the character and destiny of the soul in this command:

Keep thy heart with all diligence, for out of it are the issues of life. (Prov. 4: 23.)

Treasures on Seashore

THE recent high winds made the tide so low that several hundred persons went along the sea beaches of New York City to seach for gold and jewels that might be uncovered. The search was rewarded with the finding of three gold watches, fifty bracelets, rings, three sets of diamond earrings, a set with pearls, a ruby ring surrounded by fifteen diamonds, and many other valuables. Midas the king got a gift of the gods by which everything he touched turned to gold, and this became such a curse that he was commanded to bathe in the river of Pactolus to become free from it. He did bathe in it, and ever after its sands were full of gold. The sea bathers of the last season, as in others, caused the beaches to shine with gold and sparkle with jewels as the low tide revealed them. The revelation of things hidden by the forces of nature is thus referred to:

He bindeth the floods from overflowing; and the thing that is hid bringeth he forth to light. (Job 28: 11.)

Kindness Wins Fortune

TWENTY years ago there was a little crippled girl six years old named Marion L. Covert, who went to Marlborough, Mass., to visit relatives. There was a farmhouse near by where General Thurston, a Chicago piano manufacturer, was accustomed to board during the summer. The old gentleman took a fancy to the little girl, as she did to him. She picked wild flowers for him, and hunted through the orchards for the most luscious fruit, which she brought to him. Each season they met, and the friendship between them intensified. When he was in Chicago they exchanged letters with each other. Three years ago General Thurston died, and remembered the crippled girl in his will. The estate was settled the other day, and Miss Covert received from it the handsome fortune of $150,000. The little crippled child was lovely to the old gentleman because her heart was sweet and pure and full of joy, and she could not help it; yet the earthly fortune followed the service of unselfish love as it sometimes does. Love for Christ and loving service for him and obedience to his commandments will result in the greatest reward here and hereafter.

In keeping of them there is great reward. (Ps. 19: 11.)

Spat Upon a Bible

JUDGE N. B. NEELEN of Milwaukee the other day fined a man $25 because he spat in contempt upon a neighbor's Bible. "Did you do that?" the judge asked. The man shrugged his shoulders. "Oh, yes," he said, "I did do that, but it harmed no one, and you can see that it was wiped dry again." "You are fined $25 and costs," Judge Neelen told him. "I wish that I could send you to jail for ninety days; it would serve you right." The man was under the influence of liquor and probably did not realize what he was doing, only taking this method of insulting the man he hated. There are many persons that through bad habit or wicked impulse pour out their contempt for the divine authority. In their cold ingratitude, or moral insolence, or spiritual hatred, they resemble the enemies of Christ in olden times who spat upon him with contempt. They are of those who are threatened with severe penalty:

Of how much sorer punishment, suppose ye, shall he be thought worthy, who hath trodden under foot the Son of God, . . . and hath done despite unto the Spirit of grace? (Heb. 10: 29.)

SPEEDING OUR AID TO THE BALKANS

$3,000 MORE GOES FORWARD TO BE USED BY THE SORELY PRESSED RELIEF WORKERS. NUMBERS OF THE NEEDY STILL INCREASING. GREATER INTEREST BEING AROUSED IN AMERICA

Flying in Needless Fear Before the Advancing Bulgarians

THE struggles of the missionaries and relief workers throughout Bulgaria, Macedonia and Thrace, against the stalking specter of famine and the ravages of swift disease are being brought more fully to the world's attention by the daily press. The awful scenes in the cholera camps have been the subjects of heart-rending photographs. The crowded hospitals have been pictured and described and the hardships of those more slightly wounded who have gone back to their impoverished homes have been told in vivid language. The news despatches talk in numbers that are appalling. A recent London despatch cites its authority for "reports from Adrianople to the effect that the rations in the invested town have been reduced to one-fourth. Eighty thousand persons are sick and without medical aid or the means of obtaining warmth."

Pastor Paul L. Mishkoff in a letter mailed from Sistova, Bulgaria, shortly before Christmas says:

"You know the sufferings of the missionaries, and how, oftentimes, they fall in a miserable condition. But the sufferings are greater during war time. Such is the condition now in this country of Bulgaria. I am left almost without a cent, because I have given what I had to naked and hungry women and children. Hundreds of wounded soldiers are coming every day to this city, and they are in great need of garments, food and medicine. My home is crowded with them, pleading for help. What can I do? My means are so limited! I gave all I had, and now I am left practically without money or provisions.

"Just now there are in my home seven women crying for bread and clothes. What shall I say to them? The Bulgarian Government is not able to supply all. Christmas is at hand! But what about the crowds of people crying for bread and clothes? What about wounded soldiers? Help us in some way and God will bless you."

The sympathy of the American people is flowing in a splendidly practical way toward the unfortunate victims of this struggle in the Near East. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has been enabled, through the generous contributions of its readers, to send the following remittances to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Relief Committee in Sofia:

On November 18, 1912, $250, by postal money order through Italy.

On November 22, 1912, $1,000, by postal money order through Italy.

On November 27, 1912, $1,000; on December 5, 1912, $1,000; on December 12, 1912, $1,000; on January 3, 1913, $4,000; and on January 11, 1913, $3,000; telegraphed through the London office of Thomas Cook & Son, to the Banque National de Bulgarie at Sofia for the account of Pastor D. N. Furnajieff, president of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Relief Committee.

That these efforts on the part of this more favored nation are truly and deeply appreciated not only by those who are helped but by those who are devoting their entire energy to the relief work is shown by the reiterated thanks of the members of our Committee in Sofia, and by the appreciation and thanks which have been sent through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to the American public by Queen Eleanor of Bulgaria.

Dozens and hundreds of letters continue to pour into THE CHRISTIAN HERALD office with contributions large and small for this Balkan Relief work. Many of the letters have the deep wish and prayer of the senders that the suffering may speedily be relieved and that peace may be fully restored. Some of them recall past chapters of the history of our own country. For instance, this one: "As I read of the terrible struggle in the Balkans my mind is carried back to fifty years ago. I was made a widow by the Civil War, and know how to sympathize with the widows and orphans of the soldiers." Another letter encloses a remittance and says: "It goes with my earnest prayers that it may relieve some poor suffering ones, and that it may be the means of causing them to stop and think why people are helping them." Numbers of letters contain heartfelt prayers for the salvation of Turkey, for instance this one: "Enclosed please find one dollar for the widows and orphans of the Balkan war. It is sent with prayer for the end of the war and that a wave of salvation may sweep through the ranks of the Turks."

TOPICS OF INTEREST AT HOME AND ABROAD

—WITHIN THREE years the foreign trade of the country has increased 20 per cent., the increase being estimated at $1,000,000,000. The wave of prosperity continues to advance, and the prospects for 1913 give confidence to every branch of business.

—MISS MARY BAYLIES, of West Union, Ohio, has been engaged by Mrs. Woodrow Wilson, wife of the President-elect, as private secretary, and has already entered on her duties. The new secretary is of the Catholic faith.

—MR. DANIEL SMILEY of Lake Mohonk, N. Y., announces that in accordance with the often expressed wish of his brother, the late Albert K. Smiley, the Lake Mohonk Conferences will be continued. The nineteenth annual conference on international arbitration at Lake Mohonk will be held on May 14, 15, and 16, 1913.

—THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY has published a translation of the New Testament in Esperanto. Several translations of separate books have been published before, but this is the first of the entire New Testament, and also one of the best specimens of Esperanto, as it unites a conscientious faithfulness to the original text with something of the charm of style which is found in the English version. It is sold for one shilling six pence. A few years ago Dr. Zamenhof, the inventor of Esperanto, translated the Psalms, and he is now at work on the remainder of the Old Testament, which is being published as a serial in the Revue of Paris, so that we shall soon see the whole Bible in Esperanto.

—BY JANUARY 9 it was estimated that about one hundred and ten thousand operators were out on strike in the great struggle of the garment workers of New York to better their condition. At that time the workers in the white goods and kimono trades were voting on the question of going out and there seemed no doubt that at least sixty thousand of these operators would strike. The workers on men's garments are demanding: the abolition of foot-power; abolition of tenement house work; overtime to be paid for at the rate of time and a half, double time for holiday; a forty-eight hour week; general wage increase of 20 per cent. The workers on women's garments demand a minimum weekly wage of $10, a maximum of 54 hours per week, sanitary conditions, and the abolition of child labor.

—PLANS ARE BEING made by the woman suffragists of Washington, D. C., for a great national parade during the time when our capital city will be filled by the inauguration crowds. At first it was proposed to march in the evening, but the district police feared there might be difficulty in keeping order. The latest announcement is that they will march on the afternoon of March 3. Formal application for a permit to use Pennsylvania Avenue has already been made. Major Sylvester, superintendent of police, has stated that he will raise no objection to this plan. The organizers intend to have about 20,000 women in line to demonstrate that the women of the land are a power to be reckoned with in future political contests.

—THE SUPREME COURT of the United States, in a decision handed down on January 6, established a new principle, which will have far-reaching results, namely, that a "corner" in interstate commodities such as articles of clothing or food is in violation of the Sherman Anti-Trust Law. Justice Van Devanter, in announcing the decision, said: "It well may be that running a corner tends for a time to stimulate competition; but this does not prevent it from being a forbidden restraint, for it also operates to thwart the commodity from the normal current of trade, to enhance the price artificially, to hamper users and consumers in satisfying their needs and to produce practically the same evils as does the suppression of competition." The decision was rendered in connection with the case against James Patten, Eugene G. Scales, Frank H. Hayne and William P. Brown for "conspiring to run an alleged cotton corner."

POLLYANNA

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

ollyanna, eleven years old, comes East to live with her aunt, s Polly Harrington, of Beldingsville, Vt. Miss Harrington lady of most unlovely and ungenerous character, though she eves herself to be a very good woman, and tries vigorously lo in every case what she believes to be her duty. She has sented to receive Pollyanna at the request of the Ladies' Aid iety of the mission church in the West of which the child's ner had been pastor. Her mother, Miss Polly's sister, who never received her family's forgiveness for marrying the r minister, had died some years earlier, her father but retly. Miss Harrington consents to receive the little girl and ds her servant Nancy to the station to meet Pollyanna. From ry fresh disappointment Pollyanna rallies amazingly, always ling something to be glad about. She explains that this is a ne which her father had taught her and played with her. ncy agrees to try to play the game, too. Pollyanna takes y to Mrs. Snow, a fault-finding invalid, and after a number visits Mrs. Snow herself begins to play the game. Pollyanna meets a mysterious silent Man, who is, she learns later, . John Pendleton, a rich and rather sour rese. Aunt Polly at last has Pollyanna moved a larger and more beautiful room. After she surprised her aunt into adopting a stray dog l cat, she finds a homeless boy, and brings him confident that Miss Polly will keep him. She disappointed in this, however, her aunt resolely resisting the strange influence the little l has already begun to have upon her. Rening home one day through the woods she ds Mr. John Pendleton, who has fallen and oken his leg. He sends Pollyanna to his house, big, silent and terrifying edifice, to telephone Dr. Chilton to come with men and a stretcher. llyanna performs her errand with amazing crity, returning to hold his head on her lap the doctor comes. Pollyanna takes jelly also Mr. Pendleton, and begins to sense mysteries. llyanna continues to pay occasional visits to hn Pendleton, and they become fast friends. llyanna and romantically-inclined Nancy conde that Miss Polly and Mr. Pendleton had once en lovers, and Pollyanna decides to try to bring em together again. Mr. Pendleton later hears e story of the game from the first—"from the utches that should have been a doll"—and is duced to begin playing it in his own life. llyanna tells Mr. Pendleton of her plan when begs her to come and live with him. She is lighted, for now she believes her purpose acmplished. Though her aunt knows nothing of this, Pollyanna tells Dr. Chilton, who to her tense surprise is greatly perturbed by it. Mr. ndleton makes it all plain by telling Pollyanna at it was her mother he had once loved, and w, with the pent-up affection of years, he ges the little girl to come to him. As Pollyna is returning home she meets Nancy, who s been sent by Miss Polly with an umbrella, d decides that now her aunt really wants her d she must say "No" to Mr. Pendleton's offer.

CHAPTER XVIII—Continued

THE task of telling John Pendleton of her decision would not be an easy one, Pollyanna knew, and she dreaded it. She was ery fond of John Pendleton, and she as very sorry for him—because he eemed to be so sorry for himself. She as sorry, too, for the long, lonely life hat had made him so unhappy, and she rieved that it had been because of her nother that he had spent those dreary ears. Her heart ached for its loneliess. She wished that somewhere some ne might be found who— And it was t this point that she sprang to her feet vith a little cry of joy at the thought hat had come to her.

As soon as she could, after that, she urried up the hill to John Pendleton's ouse; and in due time she found herelf in the great dim library, with John endleton himself sitting near her.

"Well, Pollyanna, is it to be the 'glad ame' with me, all the rest of my life?" asked the an, gently.

"Oh, yes," cried Pollyanna. "I've thought of the ery gladdest kind of a thing for you to do, and—"

"With—you?" asked John Pendleton, his mouth rowing a little stern at the corners.

"N—no; but—"

"Pollyanna, you aren't going to say no!" interupted a voice deep with emotion.

"I've got to, Mr. Pendleton; truly I have. Aunt olly—"

"Did she refuse—to let you—come?"

"I—I didn't ask her," stammered the little girl, niserably.

"Pollyanna!"

Pollyanna turned away her eyes. She could not neet the hurt, grieved gaze of her friend.

"So you didn't even ask her!"

"I couldn't, sir—truly," faltered Pollyanna. You see, I found out—without asking. Aunt Polly vants me with her, and—and I want to stay, too," he confessed bravely. "You don't know how good he's been to me; and—and I think, really, sometimes she's beginning to be glad about things—lots of things. And you know she never used to be. You said it yourself. Oh, Mr. Pendleton, I couldn't leave Aunt Polly—now!"

There was a long pause. At last, however, the man spoke.

"No, Pollyanna; I see. You couldn't leave her—now," he said. "I won't ask you—again." The last word was so low it was almost inaudible; but Pollyanna heard.

"Oh, but you don't know about the rest of it," she reminded him eagerly. "There's the very gladdest thing you can do—truly there is!"

"Not for me, Pollyanna."

"Yes, sir, for you. You said it. You said only a —a woman's hand and heart, or a child's presence could make a home. And I can get it for you—a child's presence—not me, you know, but another one."

"God helping me, I'll do it!" he cried softly

"As if I would have any but you!" resented an indignant voice.

"But you will—when you know; you're so kind and good! I know you'll take him."

"Take—who?"

"Jimmy Bean. He's the 'child's presence,' you know; and he'll be so glad to be it. I had to tell him last week that even my Ladies' Aiders out West wouldn't take him, and he was so disappointed. But now—when he hears of this—he'll be so glad!"

"Will he? Well, I won't," ejaculated the man, decisively. "Pollyanna, this is sheer nonsense!"

"You don't mean—you won't take him?"

"I certainly do mean just that."

"But he'd be a lovely child's presence," faltered Pollyanna. She was almost crying now. "And you couldn't be lonesome—with Jimmy around."

"I don't doubt it," rejoined the man; "but—I think I prefer the lonesomeness."

It was then that Pollyanna, for the first time in weeks, suddenly remembered something Nancy had once told her. She raised her chin aggrievedly and said:

"Maybe you think a nice live little boy wouldn't be better than that old skeleton you keep somewhere, but I think it would!"

"Skeleton!"

"Yes. Nancy said you had one in your closet."

"Why—what—" Suddenly the man threw back his head and laughed. He laughed very heartily indeed—so heartily that Pollyanna began to cry, from pure nervousness. When he saw that, John Pendleton sat very erect very promptly. His face grew grave at once.

"Pollyanna, I suspect you are right—more right than you know," he said gently. "In fact, I know that a nice live little boy would be far better than that—my skeleton in the closet; only—we aren't always willing to make the exchange. We are apt to still cling to—our skeletons, Pollyanna. However, suppose you tell me a little more about this nice little boy." And Pollyanna told him.

Perhaps the laugh cleared the air, or perhaps the pathos of Jimmy Bean's story as told by Pollyanna's eager little lips touched a heart already strangely softened. At all events, when Pollyanna went home that night she carried with her an invitation for Jimmy Bean himself to call at the great house with Pollyanna the next Saturday afternoon.

"And I'm so glad, and I'm sure you'll like him," sighed Pollyanna, as she said good-by. "I do só want somebody to take Jimmy Bean and give him a home—with a little h, you know —and folks."

CHAPTER XIX

SERMONS AND WOODBOXES

ON THE afternoon that Pollyanna told John Pendleton of Jimmy Bean, the Rev. Paul Ford climbed the hill and entered the Pendleton Woods, hoping that the hushed beauty of God's out-of-doors would still the tumult that his children of men had wrought.

The Rev. Paul Ford was sick at heart. Month by month, for a year past, conditions in the parish under him had been growing worse; until it seemed that now, turn which way he would, he encountered only wrangling, backbiting, scandal, and jealousy.

Two of his deacons were at swords' points over a silly something that only endless brooding had made of any account. Three of his most energetic women workers had withdrawn from the Ladies' Aid Society because a tiny spark of gossip had been fanned by wagging tongues into a devouring flame of scandal. The choir had split over the preponderance of solo work given to a fanciedly preferred singer. Even the Christian Endeavor Society was in a ferment of unrest owing to open criticism of two of its officers. As to the Sunday school—it had been the resignation of its superintendent and two of its teachers that had been the last straw, and that had sent the harassed minister to the quiet woods for prayer and meditation.

Under the green arch of the trees the Rev. Paul Ford faced the thing squarely. Something must be done. The entire work of the church was at a standstill.

And because of all this, the Rev. Paul Ford understood very well that he (God's minister), the church, the town, and even Christianity itself was suffering; and must suffer still more unless—

Clearly something must be done at once. But what?

Slowly the minister took from his pocket the notes he had made for his next Sunday's sermon. His mouth settled into stern lines, as aloud, very impressively, he read the verses on which he had determined to speak:

"But woe unto you, Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye shut up the kingdom of heaven against men: for ye neither go in yourselves, neither

THE FIRST JUDGMENT DA

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

THE child is father to the man." That is just another way of expressing the fact that the kind of a boy determines the kind of a man he will be.

What kind of a boy was Noah? His father Lamech certainly expected that he would be a good boy, for the name "Noah," which he gave him, means "rest," and he said, "he shall comfort us concerning our work and toil of our hands." (Gen. 5: 29.)

Noah grew up an intelligent, well informed boy, because he had a wonderful grandfather, a man who had known Adam, and to whom Adam had told the story of Eden. The grandfather was Methusaleh. How often, over and over again, he must have told the boy Noah what Adam had told him of how God talked with him! And the boy Noah was led to wish that some day God might talk with him. As the grandfather Methuselah told him that part of Adam's story of the way he disobeyed God and was shut out of Eden, the boy Noah must have determined that he would never disobey God. Methuselah had wonderful and beautiful stories to tell the boy Noah about his own father Enoch, who was so good that he walked and talked with God; and one day walked so far away—to the heavenly land—that he never came back again. All of this was very inspiring to the boy, and helped him to become God's man.

"Noah found grace in the eyes of the Lord" (Gen. 6: 8) because he had grown up as a servant of the Lord. We read still further about him: "Noah was a just man and perfect, . . . and Noah walked with God" as his grandfather Enoch had done, but not to the heavenly land, for God had a great work for him to do on earth. God greatly honored Noah by taking him into hi counsels, and revealed to him the great sorrow he felt in that Adam's son, and their sons, and all men disobeyed him. And God said to Noah: "I will destroy man whom I have created from the face of the earth" (Gen. 6: 7). But God did not propose to destroy Noah, for he said: "Make thee an ark of gopher wood" (probably cypress, as being the most durable) . . . "With thee will I establish my covenant, and thou shalt come into the ark, thou and thy sons, and thy sons' wives with thee." The whole family of Noah was to be saved in the ark. And God told Noah to take all land animals, also birds, into the ark, two of each kind, for the preservation of the species, and besides these an added number of those that would serve as food, "by sevens." Even the plan of the ark which Noah was to build was given by God himself. It was to be three hundred cubits long (four hundred and fifty feet); fifty cubits (seventy-five feet) wide; thirty cubits (forty-five feet) high. It was to have three stories, to be compared with what we call main deck (the lowest), shelter deck, and bridge deck. There was to be "one window" in the ark, not a small opening as we know a window to be, but rather an open space probably eighteen inches wide, extending all around the ark, just under the roof, in order that there might be ventilation as well as light. The ark had but one door for entrance, and that was to be closed when men and animals had entered. Quite naturally, comparisons have been made between ocean liners of our day and the ark. They are longer in proportion to their width than the ark was, because they are built for swift sailing. The ark is more to be compared with freight boats. Some of these have been built upon the specifications of the ark, and have been found to contain more room for storage than any other model.

No doubt men stood around, and did all they could to hinder the work by their jeers. We can imagine they called the ark "Noah's folly." We have not enough appreciated the determined, straightforward way in which Noah persisted in executing the plans God had given him. Noah was six hundred years old when the ark was finished, and he lived for three hundred and fifty years after, lacking only nineteen years of attaining the great age of his grandfather Methusaleh.

Noah and his wife and his three sons and their wives were ancient "shut-ins." After they had passed into the ark, "the Lord shut them in" (Gen. 7: 16). Thus was the one door to the ark closed.

THE BUILDING OF THE ARK
From the painting by G. F. Watts, O.M., R.A.

Then it rained for forty days and forty nights: first, the valleys were covered; then the waters rose on the hillsides; then the mountain tops were covered, and everything had disappeared, men, animals, trees. Again the world must have looked as it did on the second day of the creation: a firmament of waters above, and a waste of waters below, the only difference being that a vessel filled with animal life and human life lay floating upon the waters—all there was left of what God had created on the fifth and sixth days. There has been much discussion whether or not the flood covered the whole earth. Geologists have produced such conclusive evidence that it did not extend beyond the regions of the Tigris and Euphrates Rivers that Biblical scholars agreed that the deluge probably centered about Babylonia. Dr. Schaff, one of the most learned of Bible scholars, has said: "Such expressions as 'all the high hills were covered' (7: 19) do not oblige us to go beyond those port of the earth which were then inhabited by men.

We may rest with the assurance that flood is an historical fact, attested not alone by record in Genesis, but by a Babylonian record in the British Museum, and by the appearanc the flood story in modified forms in the folklor many of the primitive races of man.

The supreme significance of the flood is that the first "day of judgment." Noah during f years preached "righteousness, temperance an judgment to come," declaring "the soul that neth, it shall die"—a "most horrible doctrine." men, no doubt, insisted as they do to-day that was too kind to destroy his wayward child even though for forty years they mocked warning of his "preacher of rig eousness," who cried out daily, "T ye, oh, turn ye, for why will ye di Men say "God cannot punish." answer is, God has punished in ma other ways for six thousand ye In Noah's day polygamy had alre begun its deadly attack on the p family life that God established Eden. The sweet grapes God h given for man's enjoyment and sus nance he had already learned to f ment into alcohol for intoxicati Gluttony had been added to drunk ness. Murder had begun its bloo work. And envy had also opened the earth the "way of Cain," in whi many had followed him. Because G did not pay by the day in punishme men said, "The Lord did not se But in fact, then as now, "God s the wickedness of man, that it w great in the earth." And sin is ways hateful to holiness. "The grea est good of the greatest numbe constrained a just God to punish s lest it should increase beyond a bounds. The flood was the first se sion of the supreme court of the un verse.

Many who reject the doctrine hell while accepting that of heave which rests on precisely the same au thority, find their difficulties sudden dispelled or at least diminished whe they begin to think of hell as but a other name for God's supreme cou of appeals, where every unjust jud ment of our unsatisfactory courts an of public and private opinion is re versed or revised. We have said thi before, but it needs to be said ove and over again, for examinations o even the best Sunday schools sho that while many children can quot verses about heaven, few can quot even one about hell. Even in evan gelical churches there are teacher and even preachers who assume to b kinder than Christ, and reject, or a least neglect, the warnings Jesus gave so numerously of the wrath to come "the wrath of the Lamb," the wrath of gentleness and purity at wilful wickedness. The final triumph of justice is essential to a God-made and God-ruled world.

The warnings of judgment that Jesus uttered for three years, as Noah for forty, are found most numerously in Matthew, who, being a converted tax-collector, naturally remembered more than others what Jesus said as one who reckoned with men in rewards and punishments. It will be a good exercise for teacher and class alike to take the Gospel of Matthew and follow it through looking for warnings, and recalling that Jonathan, the king's son, warned his friend David of Saul's deadly plot by arrows, the well-known Oriental symbols of danger, mark these warnings with arrows in the margin of the Bible as the loving warnings of our best Friend, the King's Son, who would save us from the plots with which Satan seeks to destroy us, body and soul.

DAILY MEDITATION

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR

BY REV. J. H. JOWETT, D.D.

[To assure the Meditations reaching our readers on time, for use on the stated dates, we are this week printing eleven days' Meditations, and will print weekly regularly hereafter seven days' Meditations, from Sunday to Saturday, inclusive.]

WEDNESDAY, January 22. Matthew 5: 17-24. "First be reconciled to thy brother." We are to put first things first. When we bring a gift unto the Lord he looks at the hand that brings it. If the hand is defiled the gift is rejected. Who likes to be served with unclean hands? And God, I say, looks at the hands which bring the offering. "Wash you, make you clean." "First be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift."

All this tells us why some resplendent gifts are rejected, and why some commonplace gifts are received amid heavenly song. This is why the widow's mite goes shining through the years. The hand that offered it was hallowed and purified with sacrifice. Shall we say that in that palm there was something akin to the pierced hands of the Lord? The mite had intimate associations with the Cross.

THURSDAY, January 23. James 3: 13-18. In Milton's Comus we read of a certain potion which has the power to pervert all the senses of every one who drinks it. Nothing is apprehended truly. Sight and hearing and taste are disordered, and the victim is all unconscious of the confusion. The deadly draught is the minister of deceptive chaos.

And envy is like that potion when it is drunk by the spirit. It perverts every moral and spiritual sense. The envious is more fatally stricken than the blind. He gazes upon untruth and thinks it true. He looks upon confusion and thinks it order. Envy is color-blind. It is like jealousy, of which it is a blood-relation. It never sees anything in its natural hues. It misinterprets everything.

No one can quench the unholy fire of envy but the mighty God himself. It is like a prairie fire: once kindled it is beyond our power to stamp it out. But God's coolness is more than a match for all our feverish heat. His quenchings are transformations. He converts the perverted and changes envy into good will. The bitter pool is made sweet. For confusion he gives order, for ashes he gives beauty, and in the face of an old enemy we see the countenance of a friend.

FRIDAY, January 24. Psalm 51: 1-12. Sin that is unconfessed shuts out the energies of grace. Confession makes the soul receptive of the bountiful waters of life. We open the door to God as soon as we name our sin.

Guilt that is penitently confessed is already in the "consuming fire" of God's love. When I "acknowledge my sin" I begin to enter into the knowledge of "pardon, joy, and peace." But if I hide my sin I also hide myself from "the unsearchable riches of Christ." "If we confess our sins he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness."

I must then make confession one of my daily exercises in the presence of the Lord. I am forcing the way to recovered victory when I tell the Lord the story of my defeat. Satan strengthens his awful chains when he can induce me to keep silence concerning my sin. All his plans are thrown into confusion as soon as I "pour out my soul before the Lord." When I fall let me not add to my guilt the further sin of secrecy. Unconfessed sin breeds in its lurking-place and multiplies its hateful offspring.

SATURDAY, January 25. Ephesians 4: 25-32. "Let all anger be put away from you." And yet only a moment ago the apostle had written the words: "Be ye angry and sin not." My power of anger is not to be destroyed, it is to be transformed and purified. Anger can be like an unclean bonfire: it can also be like "a sea of glass mingled with fire." There can be more smoke than light in it, more selfish passion than holy purpose. The fuel that feeds it may be envy and jealousy and spite, and not a big desire for the good of men and the glory of God. Worldly anger "is set on fire of hell"; holy anger borrows flame from the altar-fires of God.

Our anger reveals our character. What is the quality of our anger? What kindles it? Is it incited by our own wrongs or by the wrongs of another? Is it set on fire by self-indulgence or by a noble sympathy? Here is a sentence which describes the anger of the apostle Paul: "Who is made to stumble and I burn not?" Paul's holy anger was made to burn by oppression, by the cruelty inflicted upon his fellow men. His fire had nothing unclean in it: it was pure as the flame of oxygen.

This is the anger we must cherish. We cannot "work ourselves up" into it. We must resort to God, and humbly ask for a "live coal" from off the altar. We must seek to be "baptized with the Holy Ghost and with fire."

SUNDAY, January 26. I. John 3: 11-18. "Hereby perceive we the love of God, because he lay down his life for us." And the real test of any love is what it is prepared to "lay down." How much is it ready to spend? How much will it bleed? There is much spurious love about. It lays nothing down: it only takes things up! It is self-seeking, using the speech and accents of love. It is a "work of the flesh" which has stolen the label of a "fruit of the Spirit." Love may always be known by its expenditures, its self-crucifixion, its Calvaries. Love is always laying down its life for others. Its pathway is always a red road. You may track its goings by the red "marks of the Lord Jesus."

And this is the life, the love-life, which the Lord Jesus came to create among the children of men. It is his gracious purpose to form a spiritual fellowship in which every member will be lovingly concerned for his fellows' good. A real family of God would be one in which all the members bleed for each, and each for all. In a very vital sense we are to drink one another's blood. We are to find our health in one another's strength. We are to "love one another."

How can we gain this disposition of love? "God is love." "We love because he first loved us." At the fountain of eternal love we too may become lovers, "partakers of the divine nature," filled with all "the fulness of God."

MONDAY, January 27. Genesis 6: 9-22. "And the earth was corrupt." That could be seen by anybody. "And God looked!" "And God said!" "And God commanded!" All this was forgotten by everybody. "God was not in all their thoughts." Corruption abounded, but there was no recognition of the active sovereignty of God. Sinful men wrought evil in a seemingly throneless universe. But God does not sleep because men have Everybody can eat Griddle Cakes if made on a

"Wear-Ever" Aluminum Griddle

because no grease is used

The cakes will be light—a rich golden brown—appetizing and digestible.

No odor is diffused throughout the house—you cannot tell what is to be served for breakfast.

A "Wear-Ever" Griddle takes at first more heat than an iron griddle, but because it stores up so much more heat and retains it longer it requires less heat to bake cakes after the griddle has become hot.

Heat the Griddle until it sizzles when touched with a wet finger. Then reduce the heat fully one-half.

Without using grease, place batter on the Griddle. If heat has been properly regulated the cakes will not stick or burn and will be as toothsome and healthful as bread and milk.

Replace utensils that wear out with utensils that "Wear-Ever."

Always look for the "Wear-Ever" trade-mark on the bottom of every utensil.

Write for Booklet, "The Wear-Ever Kitchen," which explains how to care for aluminum utensils.

become benumbed. He is not powerless because men have become senseless. The law of righteousness is never abrogated. In our sin we must inevitably encounter God. We cannot escape! God reigneth!

The "practice of the presence of God" is a mighty defense in the hour of sinful allurement. To feel that the road is not deserted, that the shop is not empty, that we are not alone in the office, to feel that the place of temptation is also our Father's house, and that he is unspeakably near—all this would give life a sanctity which would smother evil enticement at its birth. When we lose the "sense" of God we do as we like; when we retain the "sense" of God our inclinations are subdued to his will. "Oh let me feel thee near me!"

TUESDAY, January 28. Genesis 7: 11-24. "The fountains of the great deep were broken up." "And the waters prevailed exceedingly . . . and all the high hills were covered." And the Lord who made these waters also created the dew! The Lord of the dewdrop is also "King at the flood!" The Lord whose stern law stamps the drunkard's face with loathsomeness also beautifies the face of the saint. The good Lord has his songsters, as he has also his hornets with their fierce stings. And would we have it otherwise? Would we have it all dewdrops and song? Would we choose a world in which God has no goads, no floods, no angels with flaming swords? If God's grace were not holy, and allowed us to do as we pleased, how then?

And so I think we ought solemnly to thank God for his floods. We should offer him praise "that thorns abound." We should be daily grateful that he is not morally indifferent, and we should "give thanks at the remembrance of his holiness." It is a merciful thing that the sinner's delicacies inevitably lose their taste. It is a merciful thing that the hornet stings us in the ways of disobedience. It is a token of grace that in the way of revolt we "run up against God!" The holy Lord has "threshing instruments with teeth" for those who oppose his will; but in the very severity we may find the way to purity and peace.

WEDNESDAY, January 29. Psalm 33: 13-22. Some of the old artists, when they wished to suggest the presence of God, used to place an eye in the firmament, which was intended to signify the sleepless observation of the Lord. I never liked it. When I saw it as a boy it made me think of the schoolmaster's eye, or a policeman's eye: it was the eye of some one watching keenly for people's faults and failings, with the intent to punish them. An eye does not tell us much. We need a face! A face can do wonders. A smile from his mother made Benjamin West a painter. The Lord "looked upon" Simon Peter and "he went out and wept bitterly."

Our God shows more than an eye. He has shown his face "in the face of Jesus." And now we know who it is that watches us in all our ways. We know the Face at the window! It is the face of a Lover. It is love-eyes which follow us down the road, and over the hill, and across the moor. It is love-eyes which are upon us even in our days of shameful sin. And then they are weeping eyes. "Jesus wept." "When he saw the city" he wept over it! The holy Lord sees me, and his eyes are full of tender, passionate yearning for my good.

THURSDAY, January 30. II. Peter 2: 1-9. "An ensample to those that after should live ungodly." And this for our warnings! But there is need for deliberate listening or the warning will cease to be heard. A sound may become like silence because we have become accustomed to it. The swinging buoy may ring its warning bell every moment, and in the cottage by the shore its clang may never be heard. And God's great warning bell is always ringing in the ways of time, and it may come to be that we never hear it. It rings from Sodom and Gomorrah, it rings from the fields of trespass in our own yesterdays. It rings and is unheard!

So do I say that we need deliberate listening. We want ears with wills behind them. "Ears have they but they hear not." "He that hath ears to hear let him hear." Let him direct his ears and listen with eagerness. It is amazing what sounds break upon the ear from the natural world when we listen with deliberation. Our surroundings become loud and vocal.

Let us turn our ears to Sodom. What is God saying to us? Let us turn our ears to the sinful feast we enjoyed a year ago. What is God saying? The Lord is giving solemn and awful warning. "Take heed how ye hear."

FRIDAY, January 31. Matthew 24: 32-44. Here are two sentences from two letters of the apostle Paul, which seem to me to have very vital relations. "As much as in me is, I am ready to preach": "I am now ready to be offered." The apostle was ready for death because he was always ready for obedience. He practiced readiness in present duty, and therefore he was always ready for "the great appearing." And, indeed, this is the only fitness in which our Lord delights. "Blessed is that servant who when his Lord comes shall be found so doing."

And therefore readiness is not a somber, melancholy spirit of waiting, a fearful expectancy that any moment our dread Lord may come speedily over the hill! What if the best readiness is to take a towel and gird ourselves and go about washing weary pilgrims' feet? One thing we may be sure about: we never prepare ourselves for the Lord by neglecting our fellow men. Whatever readiness means we must acquire it in the ways of immediate and willing service. The slave's apron is fine attire for the king's wedding. If we refuse to be servants we can never "sit with him on his throne."

SATURDAY, February 1. Psalm 46. "God is our refuge and strength." And in the varied conflicts and perils of life we need both these resources. We need the "refuge." There are times when our mightiest warfare is to lie passive, to shelter quietly in the strong defenses of our God. Our finest strategy is sometimes to "rest in the Lord and wait." We can slay some of our enemies by leaving them alone. We can "starve them out." They can be weakened and beaten by sheer neglect. We feed their strength, and give them favored chances, if we go out and face them actively, "marching as to war." The best way is to hide, and keep quiet: and "God is our refuge."

But we also need the "strength." This is positive equipment for active service. The defensive is changed to the offensive, and in the "strength" of the Lord we advance against the foe. We "ride abroad, redressing human wrongs." We "tread upon the lion, the young lion and the dragon we trample under foot." We meet our enemy on the open field, and we slay him in his pride!

And so our God is our resource in the double warfare of active and passive crusade. In him we can take refuge, and the enemy withers. In him we can find fighting strength, and the enemy is overthrown.

Oh, oh, Mr. Ford! You—you haven't broken your leg or—or anything, have you?" she cried.

The minister looked up quickly. He tried to smile.

"No, dear—no, indeed! I'm just—resting. I haven't broken anything—that doctors can mend."

The last words were very low, but Pollyanna heard. A swift change crossed her face. Her eyes glowed with tender sympathy.

"I know what you mean—something plagues you. Father used to feel like that lots of times. I reckon ministers do—most generally. You see there's such a lot depends on 'em, somehow."

The Rev. Paul Ford turned a little wonderingly.

"Was your father a minister, Pollyanna?"

"Yes, sir," smiled Pollyanna.

There was a long pause. The minister appeared to have forgotten Pollyanna's presence. Pollyanna, looking at him, felt vaguely sorry for him.

"It—it's a nice day," she began hopefully.

For a moment there was no answer; then the minister looked up with a start.

"What? Oh!—yes, it is a very nice day."

"And 'tisn't cold at all, either, even if 'tis October," observed Pollyanna, still more hopefully.

There was no reply this time, though Pollyanna waited patiently before she tried again—by a new route.

"Do you like being a minister?"

The Rev. Paul Ford looked up now, very quickly.

"Do I like—Why, what an odd question! Why do you ask that, my dear?"

"Nothing—only the way you looked. It made me think of father. He used to look like that—sometimes."

"Did he?" The minister's voice was polite, but his eyes had gone back to a dried leaf on the ground.

"Yes, and I used to ask him just as I did you if he was glad he was a minister."

The man under the tree smiled a little sadly.

"Well—what did he say?"

"Oh, he always said he was, of course; but 'most always he said, too, that he wouldn't stay a minister a minute if 'twasn't for the rejoicing texts."

"The—what?" The Rev. Paul Ford's eyes left the leaf and gazed wonderingly into Pollyanna's merry little face.

"Well, that's what father used to call 'em," she laughed. "Of course the Bible didn't name 'em that. But it's all those that begin 'Be glad in the Lord,' or 'Rejoice greatly,' or 'Shout for joy,' and all that, you know—such a lot of 'em. Once, when father felt specially bad, he counted 'em. There were eight hundred of 'em."

"Eight hundred!"

"Yes—that told you to 'rejoice and be glad,' you know; that's why father named 'em the 'rejoicing texts.'"

"Oh!" There was an odd look on the minister's face. "And so your father—liked those rejoicing texts?" he murmured.

"Oh, yes," nodded Pollyanna, emphatically. "He said he felt better right away, that first day he thought to count 'em. He said if God took the trouble to tell us eight hundred times to be glad and rejoice, he must want us to do it—some. And father felt ashamed that he hadn't done it, more. After that, they got to be such a comfort to him, you know, when things went wrong; when the Ladies' Aiders got to fight—I mean, when they didn't agree about something," corrected Pollyanna, hastily. "Why, it was those texts, too, father said, that made him think of the game—he began with me on the crutches—but he said 'twas the rejoicing texts that started him on it."

"And what game might that be?"

"About finding something in everything to be glad about, you know. As I said, he began with me on the crutches." And once more Pollyanna told her story—this time to a man who listened with tender eyes and understanding ears.

In the Rev. Paul Ford's study that evening the minister sat thinking. Near him on the desk lay a few loose sheets of paper—his sermon notes. Under the suspended pencil in his fingers lay other sheets of paper—blank; his sermon to be. But the minister was not thinking either of what he had written, or of what he intended to write. In his mind's eye he was far away in a little Western town with a missionary minister who was poor, sick, worried, and almost alone in the world—but who was poring over his Bible to find how many times his Lord and Master had told him to "rejoice and be glad."

After a time, with a long sigh, the Rev. Paul Ford roused himself, came back from the far Western town, and adjusted the sheets of paper under his hand.

"Matthew twenty-third; 13, 14 and 23," he wrote; then with a gesture of impatience he dropped his pencil and pulled toward him a magazine left on the desk by his wife a few minutes before. Listlessly his tired eyes turned from paragraph to paragraph until these words arrested them:

"A teacher in a country school said to one of the boys who had agreed with the other boys not to bring wood to the schoolroom: 'I know that John will be glad to go and bring in some wood for the fire.' And John went. Why? Because his teacher showed so plainly that she depended on him and that she knew he would do the right thing. Suppose she had said, 'John, I am ashamed of you. Go at once and bring in some wood!' I'm thinking that teacher would still be cold—if she depended on John for heat!"

On and on read the minister—a word here, a line there, a paragraph somewhere else:

"What people need is encouragement, uplift, hope. Their natural resisting powers should be strengthened and developed. . . . Instead of telling a man always of his faults, tell him of his virtues. Try to pull him out of his slough of despond. Picture to him his God-image, his better self, his real self that can do and dare and —win!- . . . The suggestion which comes from a beautiful, helpful, hopeful character is contagious, and sometimes revolutionizes an entire neighborhood. . . . We radiate our mental attitude, our feelings. . . . When you look at the bad, and expect it—you will get it. When you know you will get the good—you will get that! . . . Tell John you know he'll be glad to bring in some wood—and see how quick he'll run!"

The minister dropped the paper and lifted his chin alertly. "God helping me, I'll do it!" he cried softly. "I'll tell all my Johns I know they'll be glad to bring in the wood! I'll give them work to do, and I'll fill them so full of the very joy of doing it that they won't have time to look in their neighbors' wood-boxes!" And he picked up his sermon notes, tore straight through the sheets, and cast them from him, so that on one side of his chair lay "But woe unto you," and on the other, "scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites!" while across the smooth white paper before him his pencil fairly flew.

Thus it happened that the Rev. Paul Ford's sermon the next Sunday was a veritable bugle-call to the best in every man and woman and child that heard it; and its text was one of Pollyanna's shining eight hundred:

"Be glad in the Lord and rejoice, ye righteous; and shout for joy, all ye that are upright in heart."

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETINGS

NOTES ON THE CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR, EPWORTH LEAGUE AND BAPTIST YOUNG PEOPLE'S UNION TOPICS

Upholding Christian Endeavor Principles*

THE whole Society of Christian Endeavor, each individual society and each individual member of each society, is under obligation to stand by certain great principles of faith, motive and conduct. In spite of much that is said to the contrary, it does make a vast deal of difference what people believe. The welfare of persons, churches, nations, depends primarily upon the purity of their faith. Christian Endeavor stands for belief in the fact of sin, in the need of redemption, in the absolute deity of Jesus Christ, in the power of his death on the cross to save men from the doom of sin, in the personal presence of the risen Christ in the world and with every believer, in the power of the Holy Spirit to renew and energize the heart.

The faith that Christian Endeavor stands for is not merely the recognition that these things are true, but the personal acceptance of these facts for the individual life. To uphold Christian Endeavor principles, so far as faith goes, is to accept Christ as Saviour, to receive the power of the Holy Spirit for our work, to learn to trust God and accept his bounty and his help in all the tasks and experiences of life.

In the matter of motive, Christian Endeavor stands for a vigorous determination to please Christ, an earnest, affectionate longing to do his will, a tremendous desire to win others to him and to extend his kingdom. In the matter of conduct, Christian Endeavor stands for Christlikeness. We must be like him. We must think his thoughts and speak his words and do his deeds. We must care for other people as he cared for them and still cares for them; we must help them because he loves them, because he has told us that by doing kind things for them we are really performing that very service to him.

The Bible passage assigned for our study is one of the wonderful and singularly beautiful spots in the garden of Scripture, John 14: 6-15. Notice again, and ponder prayerfully, how everything centers about Christ. He is the way, the truth, the life. To know and see him is to know and see God. He will do for us what we ask. If we believe in him he will give us the very fulness of his strength for the work we have to do. If we love him we will keep his commandments, his principles.

Remember that the strength and victory of the great Society of Christian Endeavor depends upon the purity, the earnestness, the faith, the fidelity of its members. How strong would Christian Endeavor be if every member were just like you?

The Temptation of Jesus †

ALL the world loves a good fighter—if the fight is worth while. Of all the great fights recorded in history, the fight of Jesus against the devil is the most splendid. There was very much at stake—the salvation of a world. There was probably vastly more than that at stake. But he stood steady, fought skillfully and hard, and won a sublime victory.

In the New Testament the word for "trial" and "temptation" is the same. Our second reference, Luke 22: 28, gives the words of Jesus to his disciples: "Ye are they who have continued with me in my temptations" (the American Revision has "in my trials"). He never promised to save his followers from trouble; in fact, he often declared specifically that if they followed him they would have trouble. But he did promise and he does promise to save them in their trouble. They will get victory over it; they will not be overwhelmed by it; they will go through it undaunted and come out of it strong and glad and safe at the end.

The victory of Jesus over his temptations and over his troubles has a very definite value to every one of us. It teaches us that there is no fault in being tempted, that it is no sign of God's disfavor to have trouble. But it does teach us that in our spirits we can always be triumphant. We can say with Paul, whose very call to follow Jesus was a call to suffer: "Now thanks be unto God, who always causeth us to triumph in Christ" (II. Cor. 2: 14). Read also with especial care John 16: 33; II. Cor. 12: 7-10; Rom. 8: 28-39.

So far as direct temptations go, remember that the devil is always a coward. We have only to face him down vigorously as Jesus did, quoting the promises of God and defying him. "Resist the devil and he will flee from you" (James 4: 7). Remember that all the strength Jesus had when he fought his great battle he promised to give to us for our battles if we trust him. We fight a foe who is already conquered. The great victory of Jesus long ago makes possible our victory to-day and every day.

The Ideal Christian*

THIS topic, assigned to the Baptist Young People's Union for this Sunday, is the subject of the Christian Endeavor meeting for next Sunday, February 9. It will be treated more fully then, and practically all of you will get next week's paper in time to prepare for the meeting on February 2. But there is space for a preparatory word. This is the second lesson in the series, "The Ideal Christian." On January 5 we considered "his consecration"; to-day we consider "his zeal."

How did you ever get the idea in your head that you were excused from the obligation of being an "ideal Christian"? You really did have that idea, didn't you? You thought others, a few others, certain chosen ones, were expected to be ideal Christians, but you would be doing well enough if you lived a second- or third-rate Christian life. Have you really allowed some such concession to yourself? It is a very dangerous and very foolish business, is it not? We are, all of us, called to be saints.

If our consecration is complete, then our zeal must be intense. The measure of our obligation is our opportunity. The work is incomparably important—souls to save, society to regenerate, the world to redeem. The motive is the love of Christ. Does that constrain us? Are we throwing our lives away, jubilantly, passionately for him, and for the souls he died to save? He can so change us, and cleanse us, and bless us, and inspire us, that we shall delight in doing his will, even in bearing tribulations, such as Paul describes in our Scripture reference, for his sake.

A GOOD BREAKFAST
Some Persons Never Know What it Means

A good breakfast, a good appetite and good digestion mean everything to the man, woman or child who has anything to do, and wants to get a good start toward doing it.

A Mo. man tells of his wife's "good breakfast" and also supper, made out of Grape-Nuts and cream. He says:

"I should like to tell you how much good Grape-Nuts has done for my wife. After being in poor health for the last 18 years, during part of the time scarcely anything would stay on her stomach long enough to nourish her, finally at the suggestion of a friend she tried Grape-Nuts.

"Now, after about four weeks on this delicious and nutritious food, she has picked up most wonderfully and seems as well as anyone can be.

"Every morning she makes a good breakfast on Grape-Nuts eaten just as it comes from the package with cream or milk added; and then again the same at supper and the change in her is wonderful.

"We can't speak too highly of Grape-Nuts as a food after our remarkable experience." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. —Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

THE CORRECT THING IN LETTER-WRITING

THERE were fifty-nine prize-winners in our recent letter-writing contest, which speaks well for the talent and taste of "Younger Readers." So many delightful, newsy and complimentary letters were spoiled, however, in their general make-up that in order to be prepared for the next letter-writing contests, we are giving here a few fundamental rules which, in polite letter-writing, should always be observed.

In writing your letter be sure to use good black ink, and, where it is possible, on white, unruled paper.

Write in straight lines and spell correctly.

Leave out flourishes and never abbreviate words or omit the articles "the" and "a" before nouns.

Never cross your letter.

Write numbers and dates with special care and correctness.

Leave a margin on the left-hand side of your letter paper.

Fold the letter neatly right side up and put it into the envelope so that the person who opens it, with the back of the envelope toward her, will not have to turn your letter over to read it.

Address the envelope clearly and stick the stamp evenly in the upper right-hand corner.

Give your whole address in the upper right hand corner of the initial page, or in the lower left hand corner of the page if you have written only a short note.

Sign your letter with your name in full.

Always use figures for giving dates or the number of house or street.

Write no anonymous letters; it is not a polite thing to do.

IMPOSSIBLE as it at first may seem, you can get an egg inside of a bottle without breaking either the bottle or the egg. First put the egg into a cup of strong vinegar, when the shell will soon soften, and it can be introduced into the bottle. Then fill the bottle with clear, cold water, which will make the shell hard and restore the egg to its normal shape.

THE "CATHOLIC CENTER" IN GERMANY

BY MARTIN ILSEN

WHEN the cable recently reported that the Catholic and the Socialist parties of the German Parliament opposed the government's oil monopoly bill, many wondered why a Catholic party should antagonize a measure which in no way seemed to touch church interests.

The so-called "Center" is, and has always been, an avowedly political party. In 1871, in announcing its organization, the leaders boldly described it as not a confessional, but essentially a political party. In the preceding year, after the fall of the Pope's temporal power, those leaders of the Prussian Catholics who resented this "fall" and were called Ultramontanes united and formed a party in the Prussian Diet. Then, during the elections for the first German Reichstag in 1871, they only supported such candidates for the Federal Diet as pledged themselves to join a Catholic Party. With a strength of sixty-three they entered the Reichstag and took seats in the center of the hall, between the Right and the Left parties.

In its first platform it proclaimed as "its special aim, to stand for maintaining and developing constitutional rights in general and for the liberty and independence of the church and its institutions in particular." The party tried to put into the constitution of the new German Empire a provision that the Roman Catholic Church should have the right to administer its affairs "independently"—free from any State supervision. It was a political party from the start. For centuries religious and political affairs had been closely connected in Germany, and, indeed, Bishop Ketteler went so far as to call the provision for the "independence" of the church which they demanded, the "Magna Charta of religious peace"! In 1879 the party supported Bismarck's protectionist policy.

This support of the government was contrary to the general practice of the Centrists. They had organized their party as one in opposition; but they were and always have been willing to support any measure of any party or of the government, in order to attain their own ends.

The party showed its warlike spirit when Prussia and, a little later, the German Empire asserted the supremacy of the state over all churches, congregations and ecclesiastical institutions within their territories. Prussia began the fight against the claims of the Catholic Church renewed by the Vatican Council (1869) and reiterated by the Centrists. Among the doctrines thus asserted by that council were those which insisted upon the subordination of all governments to the authority of the church.

By a German federal law of 1872 the Jesuits were expelled from the empire, and in May, 1873, four Prussian laws followed providing for control by the State of educational and ecclesiastical appointments. In the enforcement of these enactments many priests were deprived of their stipends, religious orders were abolished, and institutions were closed. Bismarck's hope to subdue the party, however, was not realized. The "Kulturkampf" laws were repealed one after another until only certain features remained. One of these was the Anti-Jesuit law. Not until 1904 were the Centrists strong enough to induce the Federal Council and the Reichstag to repeal this one also, except one excluding the Jesuits and such bodies from the Empire.

The Centrists came into prominence again when, in 1906, the German Government wished to establish a separate Colonial Office. Then it was found out that the administration of the colonies had been for years conducted at practically the dictation of the Centrists, and that this was why they opposed the setting up of the Colonial Department as a separate office. Dernburg's stand against them in the Reichstag and the refusal of the Centrists to consent to the establishment of a separate Colonial Office caused the dissolution of the Reichstag.

Now the Centrists are in arms again, because the German Federal Council on November 28, 1912, authoritatively interpreted that provision of the Anti-Jesuit law still in force. Since 1872 the Ultramontanes have unceasingly demanded its repeal, and now feel aggrieved by the recent confirmation. This feeling is especially strong in Bavaria, where the law had been worked leniently, and the decision had been asked for by Bavaria. Following the 1872 interpretation the Jesuits in Germany were forbidden to hold religious meetings or display any pastoral or spiritual activity, besides being forbidden to act as teachers.

In Bavaria, however, where the Centrists, by reason of their strength in the Diet, had much influence over the government, Minister von Wehner tacitly tolerated certain pastoral activities of the Jesuits. It was only in details that his decree of 1911 differed from that of 1872; but this action displeased the Center, and in the next election campaign they attacked his decree and denounced him. When they won out at the polls, Minister von Wehner resigned. Last February Dr. von Knilling took his place, and Baron George von Hertling became prime minister. He at once issued "a decree on the enforcement of that law. He ruled that neither the so-called "conferences" (lectures) nor such pastoral actions as had the purpose of temporary relief or assistance in spiritual work, and were done under the authority of the proper pastorate, were forbidden. Furthermore, it should not matter whether these "conferences" were held in or outside of a church. The decree very soon became widely known and caused a sensation all over Germany. Chancellor von Bethmann-Hollweg requested a transcript of it, and after negotiations the Bavarian Government asked the Federal Council for an interpretation of the law. The Federal Council declared that the Jesuits were forbidden any and all pastoral or religious activity as well as education and instruction; that they, however, were allowed, unless provisions of State laws order differently, to celebrate low masses; to assist at the first mass of a newly appointed priest, if it were conducted as a family affair; and to administer the last sacraments.

This was so complete a reversal of Minister von Hertling that one of the leading Bavarian papers advised him to resign. But all the Centrists in the Reichstag (as well as Bavaria) are aroused. Mr. Erzberger, in an "interview' in one of the party papers, said: "Our entire inner-political situation has changed. The Center will place this decision in the foreground of all politics until the Federal Council makes way for liberty and right."

An illuminating commentary on the foregoing is found in an editorial in the Western Watchman, St. Louis, of December 12, 1912, because it affirms the direct control of the German Center by the Vatican by such statements as these: "Leo XIII interposed his authority to save the Iron Chancellor from certain defeat," . . . "Leo again held the Center in check and bade them rally to the support of the government."

ANSWERS TO FINANCIAL QUERIES

B., Connecticut.

I believe Pennsylvania stock, paying 6 per nt., is to be preferred to New Haven stock ying 8 per cent. The former earns its divind; the latter does not.

B., M.D., New York.

(1) The par value of American Gas & Elec- c stock either preferred or common is $50. ie common pays 7 per cent.; the preferred ys 6 per cent. (2) Not on the New York ock Exchange. It is an "outside" or unlisted curity. (3) For a business man's specula- e investment, yes.

rs. D., Iowa.

Your savings are doubtless permanently "in- sted" in the wireless telephone stock. It has value. Cameron Speare and some of his leged associates in the promotion of the wire- is scheme were put on trial November 13, in e Federal District Court, New York, charged the government with using the mails with tent to defraud. At the time this issue went press, the trial had not been concluded.

. P. S., Missouri.

(1) You have made an exceedingly good lection. When a wage-earner invests his savgs in high-class Public Utility Bonds, he is t likely to have many sleepless nights. (2) ie Pacific Gas and Electric Gen. & Ref. 5s id the Preferred Stock are quoted at about e same prices, 19½-92. I favor the bonds, though they pay one per cent. less than the eferred stock.

ev. H. H. S., Alabama.

Your spare time may be much more profitably nployed than the way you propose. Selling ining stock to your friends is pretty sure to id in many personal estrangements, for the ances are only about one in several thousand an average mining enterprise succeeding. A tter plan would be to represent a reputable vestment firm and effect sales of high-class curities. The profits at first will be smaller, it there will be no "come-backs" and you will uild up eventually a desirable clientage.

. J. B. M. D., Missouri.

(1) I certainly do favor public utility securies, under certain conditions. It is estimated at more than two billion dollars is now insted in public utilities, and a goodly portion this sum has been invested in the last half zen years by the American investors who ave been taught by experience that the busiess of public service corporations is conserva- ve and profitable. (2) American Light & raction, pfd. at $108. Cities Service, common $118. Denver Gas & Electric, gen., 5s at $97. acific Gas & El., pfd., at $91. Wisconsin Gas El., first 5s at $98½.

The price of Ontario & Western shares well eflects the decreasing earnings of the road for ie year 1911, which, when the last dividend as paid, amounted to a total of $2,880,626; at is, for the fiscal year ending June 30 and or a corresponding period for 1912 the total ncome was but $2,126,983. The dividend due August, 1912, was passed. There is still 4,000 preferred stock outstanding, the balance aving been exchanged for first mortgage onds. There is a total funded indebtedness of 28,595,000. After meeting all fixed charges, which included $210 on the outstanding preerred stock, the equivalent for the fiscal year or dividend purposes on the common stock is ut 0.82 per cent., so you see there is very ttle prospect of dividend payments. I should ake my money out of the stock and invest the roceeds in one of the standard railroads.

'. D., Florida.

If you can save but $10 a month, save it. hat sum regularly paid in to a good building nd loan association every month for a period f twelve years amounts to $2,000. The scope f building and loan associations is usually imited and purely local, and I do not generally avor a plan which entails sending money to a distant association. Some of the New York real estate companies base successful operations on much the same methods as employed by the building and loan associations, and money regularly deposited with them shows a fine increment at the end of a cumulative period of ten, fifteen or twenty years.

W. W. L., New York.

The Daniels & Fisher Stores Company's 7 per cent. Guaranteed First Preferred Cumulative stock is all outstanding, but dealers in unlisted securities have been making the trading market for this issue and the shares are now about 10 points above the price which was obtained originally. The Daniels & Fisher Stores Company is one of the oldest dry goods firms in the West—the oldest, I believe, in Denver; and its reputation is high with the local shopping public. Still, I do not see in this stock any great attraction. Dry goods stores are beset by all manner of competition, and no matter how old or successful, or how well thought of a concern may be, it is subject to hazards of trade that do not surround a public service corporation; and for this reason I should favor either a public utility preferred stock, or some of the 7 per cent. preferred industrials that are listed on the New York Stock Exchange.

J. W. H., West Virginia.

You ask me to name an "absolutely safe" investment that will draw 6 per cent. interest, and state that you can spare your money for three or four years. I do not know of any "absolutely safe" investment that will draw 6 per cent. interest. In the larger towns and cities approved first mortgages on improved real estate may be considered safe, bring 6 per cent. interest and are generally made for three to five year periods of time. Upon inquiring I find that it would be difficult to make such a loan in your village. In your case I favor municipal bonds. New York City 4 per cent. or 4½ per cent. bonds may be bought around par; City of Chicago Municipal 4s; City of Baltimore Corporate 4s; City of Duluth Gold 4½s; Houston (Texas) 5s are also desirahle investment securities. I can also suggest the following public service bonds: Watertown (N. Y.) Light & Power Co. 1st 5s, netting 5 per cent.; Maryland Electric Railway, 1st S. F. 5s, netting 5.05; Seattle Lighting Co. Refunding 5s, netting 5.22. Also the following railroad bonds may be considered desirable for you: Michigan Central, Grand River Valley Div. 1st 4s, netting 4.15; Lehigh Valley Railroad, 1st 4½s, netting 4.20; Duluth Short Line Railway, 1st 5s, netting 4.30; New York Central, 4½s, netting 4.90.

Mrs. J. P. A., New York.

(1) The railway stocks you have under consideration are purely speculative issues, and do not come under the investment class. Discussed purely for its speculative merits, Southern Pacific is the most uncertain railroad stock on the list at the present time, and I would not commit myself to direct advice regarding its future. Wall Street has changed its mind many times since the Supreme Court decision affecting the Harriman combination. I would not buy the stock at present. (2) U. S. Steel preferred I regard as safer, although this stock too is shadowed by a possible command from the Supreme Court that the company shall dissolve itself into its former component parts and also by possible drastic tariff reduction, which might affect unfavorably the prices of the shares of the Steel Corporation. I should certainly keep out of U. S. Steel common, which you also have under consideration. (3) Southern Pacific Collateral Trust 4s are looked upon as an excellent investment security, but the segregation of the Southern and Central Pacifics approaching, must be regarded as furnishing a certain degree of speculative element to a formerly considered non-speculative security. (4) I do not believe any woman should invest money in stocks or bonds that are the slightest speculative. I shall be glad, if requested, to furnish you a list of securities applicable to a woman, and shall confine suggestions to securities that meet the following requirements: (a) Safety of principal. (b) Marketability. (c) Income.

Assets more than $10,000,000 1912 STATE DEPARTMENT AUDIT 1912 Insurance in force more than $50,000,000

The triennial audit, just concluded, was a most exhaustive inquiry, made possible because the Company eliminates all branch offices and agents, conducting its business under one roof—from a single headquarters, the Home Office in New York.

The inquiry was made thorough because it was the first examination since the Postal absorbed another, and a larger company, and also because the State Superintendent recognized that his official report would be a practical certification of the Company to other State Superintendents: the latter, mindful of the rigid New York requirements and of the strict supervision of its Insurance Department, have agreed that a company measuring up to New York State standards would be accepted and accredited in other States.

The outcome is therefore flattering to the Postal Life, and commends it to thoughtful insurers everywhere.

The Chief Examiner of life companies in his statement submitted to the Honorable William Temple Emmet, Superintendent of Insurance, refers to the high order of the Postal's risks secured by the non-agency method, and to the progress of the Company in bringing its organization to a high standard of efficiency.

He adds that the cost of securing business by advertising and correspondence has not increased pro rata, with the new business written. The business-getting expense will therefore, as contended by the Company, decrease from year to year.

He also adds that part of the cost of advertising should be charged to old business, as continued publicity has a tendency to keep up the confidence of policyholders and retain them.

The examination covers many pages of a printed document on file at the State Department.

3d. The Usual contingent policy-dividends, enhanced by Postal Life economies, still further reduce the cost each year after the first.

Superintendent Emmet, in a memorandum filed with the Examiners' Report December 16th, 1912, calls special attention to the writing of insurance by mail as bringing the policyholders into communication with the home office. He states that the report shows a general improvement in the condition of the Company.

There is merit, he furthermore states, in the health-work of the Medical Department, not only to the Company and its policyholders but to the general public as well.

Particular reference is made to the absence of litigation arising from questions with POSTAL policyholders.

He speaks of the number of improvements made in the handling of its business, and points out that gains have been made notwithstanding the considerable expenditure in 1912 for betterment of of the Company's properties.

Thus is the Company commended by the highest authorities to the public. The official endorsements, the conduct of its business through publicity channels, and its operations subject to the United States postal authorities, carry confidence to intending insurers, as well as to its own body of policyholders.

Total Assets and Liabilities

At the close of the examination the Company had over $50,000,000 insurance in force; the policy and other liabilities were fully covered by statutory and departmental reserves amounting to $10,029,510.10 with an excess or surplus to policyholders of $226,874.55

The company's reserves and other assets are in approved securities, including state, municipal and railroad bonds; bonds and mortgages, real estate, policy-loans, accrued interest, deferred net-premiums, cash in bank and various other items, aggregating $10,256,384.65

In writing the Company for particulars for yourself, please give: First, your full name; Second, your occupation; Third, the exact date of your birth. Also mention THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of January 22nd.

Bear in mind no agent will be sent to visit you. The POSTAL dispenses with agents, and pays to you in cash or credits you in equivalent dividends, or paid-up insurance, the amount of agency commissions.

Telephone Bonds

Deservedly popular are the bonds of the American Telephone and Telegraph Co. and its subsidiaries. The steadily increasing margin of security for principal and interest places these bonds foremost among public service securities. In addition each bond is backed morally and financially by the parent Bell Company. Write for booklet H. "Diversified Investments" describing telephone bonds that pay 5%.

Questions and Answers

Friend, Winter Haven, Fla. 1. Please explain Matt. 26: 29. 2. Also Isa. 65: 21, 22.

1. This passage is more clearly rendered in Luke 22: 17 and Mark 14: 25. Its primary application is obviously to the new Gospel kingdom to be fully established when the old Jewish economy with its Passover and temple rites should disappear. Its farther application is to that spiritual banquet in the celestial kingdom of which he speaks in Luke 22: 30. 2. The prophet was here describing the better age to come on earth (see verse 17), which, though much superior to the present, still would not be perfect. The tree is the longest-lived object in nature, and the inhabitants would enjoy a life as long as the trees they plant and their children with them. Commentators agree that from chapters 40 to the end, Isaiah gives a series of spiritual disclosures concerning the future history of the Jewish race under the Messiah.

L. M., Bradley, Tenn. What are the seven wonders of the world at present?

The modern wonders are the Spectrum Analysis, X-Rays, Wireless Telegraph, the Aeroplane, the Telephone, Radium and Antiseptics with Antitoxins.

O. W. N., Troy, Idaho. Your question as to Paul's probable choice of a denomination, if he were alive to-day, is purely speculative. No one can assume to state where his preference would lie, or even whether he would not rather be a free apostle, a worker at the front, a planter of Christian churches and a strong advocate of church union. In his own day, he had trouble enough with the divisions that marked the early church and we generally find him in the rôle of peacemaker and healer of breaches. Paul's view would probably be that no one branch has a monopoly of the truth. He certainly would be intensely evangelical and broad-minded, yet averse to the modern ideas and interpretations which mark some of our churches to-day. The whole subject is conjectural, however.

S. R., Fayette, Iowa. According to Biblical chronology what date is set for the creation of the world?

Many dates have been put forward based upon the genealogical tables of the Old Testament, but as yet there is no universal agreement of authority. The best known chronology is that of James Ussher, Archbishop of Armagh, who about 1640 arranged a system which was printed in marginal notes to the English Bible. According to Ussher's notation the earliest date is 4004 B.C. He reckoned backward from 1 A.D. as far as recorded history, sacred and secular, gave any basis, and there his chronology stopped. The Bible itself gives no clue to the date of creation. It simply says: "In the beginning."

Reader, Columbus, Ind. There are, unfortunately, bad plays as well as good plays—some that are degrading while others are uplifting. If the drama could be purified of all the evil in it, no exception could be taken to it as a means of instruction and entertainment. In the present condition of affairs, however, patronage of the theater is not consistent with the Christian profession for the reasons we have stated. It is our duty to avoid even "the appearance of evil." With regard to church entertainments, cantatas, readings, recitals, concerts, etc., these may be unexceptionable, if the selection be judiciously made. We do not believe in turning the Lord's house into a place for the drama. Chautauqua programs are usually such as might be given anywhere without exciting adverse criticism. The whole question thus becomes one of individual judgment. The line should be drawn conscientiously, to exclude entertainments that are not suitable. What would be unobjectionable in a public hall may sometimes be quite out of place in a church.

"Anxious Wife." 1. It would be better to have a frank talk with the person you mention, telling her what happened, and stating that you regret it. The Scripture teaching about confession is very clear, and when an act of ours is a wrong to some one else we should acknowledge our fault. This is not so hard to do as one is apt to think, and the relief to one's soul is very great. 2. If you know the name of the company send the money there. Although the amount was very small and the act committed in a spirit of mischief, yet if there was even a slight value to the property taken you should make restitution. 3. If you cannot win his consent let the matter rest for the present. By your patience, faithfulness, kindness, and your own earnest prayers, you will be able, doubtless, to persuade him sooner or later.

S. J. P., North Clymer, N. Y. 1. Please explain Dan. 11: 45. 2. Why are there thirty-one days in January and only twenty-eight in February? 3. State the length and cost of the Panama Canal. 4. Is the human body renewed every seventh year? If so, are the mental processes affected?

1. Dan. 11: 45 should be read in conjunction with the preceding five verses. According to the best interpreters, the prophet is describing Antiochus as the type of Antichrist. He

THERE is a thread of pure gold running through the Twilight Tales from which the reader may divine the author's purpose in writing the book. It is the line of God's protecting love and care which encircles all who trust in Him, and the knowledge of which gives to even the smallest detail of everyday life a purpose and significance. She spreads before us the little daily dramas, the heartaches, the disappointments, the sweet surprises and unexpected joys, the separations and the reunions, the cares and consolations of the household, the "journeys that end in lovers' meeting"—all are unrolled like a moving picture, with the vivid action of life itself. Mrs. Sangster has crowded the best heart and soul stories of her whole career into this book. Love, romance, self-denial, ambition and the success that true character commands are here pictured with a fragrant setting of American home-life in town and country.

It was obligatory in the early Christian Church and is so to-day in a majority of the denominations. It is one of the ordinances which should not be neglected.

V. P., Bessemer, Ala. The language of Luke 24: 39 is clear and explicit. The resurrection body proved that Jesus was "the Son of God with power" in taking to himself the same identical body which had been crucified and laid in the grave, and yet which had been glorified "by some such inscrutable change as took place at the transfiguration." The very fact attests him as the Master of life and death and as divine. He continued forty days on earth after the resurrection, taking again to himself that life which he had laid down, in order that his followers and the whole world might be convinced of the completeness of his triumph over the grave and that he had not "seen corruption." He ascended to heaven a spiritual body. (Phil. 3: 21; Col. 3: 4.)

THE "SACRED BOOKS" OF THE MORMONS

BY PROF. EDGAR J. BANKS*

T HAS been estimated that something like twenty millions of Egyptian mummies have been discovered. Thousands of those best preserved are now in the showcases of the various museums of the world. In the tombs with the mummies were countless other ects. There were paintings on the walls, chairs and tables, jars taining the parts of the body which were removed when the mummy s prepared, mummy cases gaudily colored with funeral scenes and roglyphic inscriptions, and in the cases along with the mummies were pyri. Beneath each mummy's head, like a cushion, was a little disk of clay papyrus, covered with mythological pictures and with a stereotyped hymn. e disks, found in great numbers, are nearly alike, varying only slightly with e period from which they come. "Hypocephali," they are called, because ey were placed beneath the head. Like the mummies, the objects found with em have been scattered abroad, and in the museum at Cairo any tourist may rchase as many of them as he will.

The inscriptions on the disks and the mummy cases, of course, could not at st be read, nor could the mythological pictures accompanying them be under- od until the inscriptions could be read. However, in 1799 the famous Ro- ta Stone was discovered, and Champollion, a French scholar, began the slow ocess of deciphering its hieroglyphic inscription with the aid of the accom- nying Greek translation. The process was so slow that it was not till 1841 at a grammar of the Egyptian language appeared. Then the progress in e study of the language was rapid; the strange hiero- yphics became as intelligible as an Englisn newspaper, d the mythological scenes were clearly understood.

About seventy years ago, before the ancient Egyptian lan- iage could be read, Mormonism appeared. Its founder, seph Smith, presented his followers with two books, hich he claimed were of divine origin. The Book of Mor- on, so he claimed, he copied from plates of gold which an gel brought to him in New York State. The book pre- nds to be a history of the American Indians and of a race white people who lived in America before its discovery Columbus. The testimony of eleven men, who claimed at they had seen the plates of gold or the angel, was suffi- ent to convince Smith's followers that the book was truly divine origin. Such testimony is always a purchasable mmodity. However improbable or impossible it may em that an angel brought down from heaven inscribed ates of gold to Smith, the final test of the truth of Smith's aims must come from the history of the American Indians d from the alleged white race. As yet scholars know tle of the early history of the Indians, and the white race ems to have been imaginary. Therefore it is impossible present to prove or disprove the veracity of the claims of nith and of the eleven witnesses.

Prof. Banks in Egyptian Costume

The second book, The Doctrine and Covenants, contains the divine laws, hich, so Smith claims, God delivered to him orally. It is the laws of this ok which sanction plural marriages. There were no witnesses to hear the ice of God delivering the laws to Smith. We have only Smith's own word, d to his followers that seems to have been sufficient. Therefore at present would be difficult to prove the truth or falseness of Smith's claims.

However, there is a third Mormon book, The Book of Abraham, published der the title of The Pearl of Great Price. It is a new history of the formation of the world, from Abraham, given to Smith through the aid of an Egyptian mummy. It contains Smith's alleged translations of some Egyptian documents relating to Abraham in Egypt, and some illustrations representing God and Abraham and various deities, which are called Egyptian. The Book of Abraham was Smith's weak point. He did not foresee that in time the Egyptian hieroglyphs on the millions of objects in Egypt would become as clear as English characters; that the Egyptian drawings would be perfectly intelligible, and that the deception would become like an open book.

Some time about 1835, Smith, so he writes in his diary, received from Michael H. Chandler some mummies and two or three pieces of papyri. They were ordinary mummies, just like the millions of others found in Egypt, and the papyri contained the stock inscriptions and drawings which were placed in the tombs of all mummies. Remember, that at that time the first Egyptian grammar had not appeared; the only Egyptian scholars were Champollion and two or three others who were trying to guess at the meaning of the Egyptian characters, with the aid of the Greek translation on the Rosetta Stone. Though the Egyptian language could not yet be read, Smith, an American. without the aid of the Rosetta Stone, but by means of a special "revelation," or by the help of a mummy, translated the disks, and thus The Book of Abraham was given to his followers. There were none to challenge his translation, for then none could read the Egyptian, and so the matter was dropped. Since then the Egyptian language has become perfectly intelligible, and recently Bishop Spalding of Utah asked the leading Egyptian scholars to verify or disprove Smith's translation.

If it were not for the prominence that Mormonism has attained; if it were not for the debauching polygamous practices which it sanctions, Smith's translations of the Egyptian documents, and his explanation of the drawings, would be simply ludicrous and unworthy of serious notice. The most elementary student of Egyptian may see at a glance from the translation that Smith had not the slightest knowledge of the Egyptian language, or history, or burial customs, and that the source of his inspiration was equally ignorant of these things. Yet it was all taken seriously by his followers.

One of the drawings in The Pearl of Great Price represents, so Smith says, Abraham lying on an altar about to be sacrificed by a priest. Near by is the angel of the Lord and four gods whom Smith calls by peculiar names, in the form of jars with covers shaped like the heads of animals. There is no inscription accompanying the drawing, but Smith is inspired to interpret the picture. Go to any Egyptian museum and look at the papyri or the mummy cases, and you will find practically the duplicate of this drawing over and over again. It was one of the stock pictures used at most Egyptian burials. Smith, however, slightly altered his copy of it to suit his purpose. From the Egyptian Book of the Dead and other Egyptian writings,

A STORMY MONTH AT SEA

THOUGH this season of the year is apt to bring many tales of bad weather on the high seas, the last few weeks have been phenomenal in the number of such accidents. A few wrecks and many mishaps have been reported. Even some of the stoutest ships have run into the maelstrom of bad weather in the North Atlantic, and come out considerably battered. One of the most unfortunate victims among the ocean liners is the steamship Uranium of the Uranium Steamship Company, bound from Rotterdam to New York with Halifax, Nova Scotia, as a port of call. On the morning of January 12 in a dense fog the Uranium struck a reef in Shoal Cove near the lighthouse at Chebucto Head about nine miles out from Halifax. As there were 839 passengers on board, most of them bound for New York, much excitement prevailed. To many of these came visions of the ill-starred Titanic, which threw them into a state of terror, and for a time there was something of a panic. In a short while, however, Captain Eustace and his officers succeeded in allaying the fears of the frightened ones, assuring them there was no possibility of danger until help arrived. Fortunately the lighthouse-keeper at Chebucto had telephonic connection with Halifax, and as soon as the news of the mishap was announced the port authorities despatched the government tender, Lady Laurier, to the assistance of the disabled vessel. The steamer Bridgewater, accompanied by several tugs, also rushed to the spot. In the meantime most of the passengers had scrambled into the lifeboats of the Uranium and three surf-boats from the life-saving station which had reached the scene of the accident before the tender. From these boats, amid considerable excitement, they were transferred to the Lady Laurier and the Bridgewater, and conveyed to Halifax, to which port twenty in the cabin and two hundred and eighteen in the steerage were destined. The remainder were booked chiefly to New York, where they arrived a couple of days later by train. Not a life was lost.

When the Uranium ran ashore a heavy southwest wind was blowing, but the projection of Chebucto Head protected the steamer from the full force of the gale. Had the wind been from the opposite direction the vessel would have been exposed to the open sweep of the Atlantic and must have broken up at once. As it was she struck bow on when the tide was half high and as a result the plates at the bow were ripped open, and No. 1 hold immediately filled with water. The accident took place on the same ledge and near the spot where the White Star liner Atlantic was lost in April, 1873, and six hundred lives sacrificed. Captain Eustace and his crew stuck to the stranded vessel, which was floated off the reef a few days afterwards.

The Uranium left Rotterdam December 28, and from the first had encountered heavy seas and weather. When she struck she was far out course, attributable to the fact that she had t act the good Samaritan of the sea by heark to the call of a sister ship in distress. Dur thick fog on the preceding Sunday the Ur received a wireless message from the Carthag of the Dominion Line, saying the latter was on fire and asking help. tain Eustace immediately altere course in the direction of the st ship, but an hour later another less came stating the fire was control. The incident, however Captain Eustace out of his cours in trying to gain it he became what confused. The Uranium ters 3,319 tons, and is 420 fe length. She was built at Dumb twenty-one years ago for the B East India Steamship and Na tion Company at a cost of $250,0

Many other vessels coming port within the past few weeks pounded by heavy seas and tosse strong winds. The North Ge Lloyd liner, Grosser Kurfürst, li into New York Harbor on Jan 17 under the sole power of her board propeller, the crank shaf her port engine having been br in the heavy seas when she was three days out.

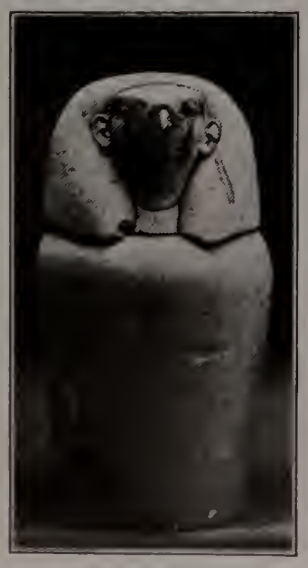
THE "SACRED BOOKS" OF THE MORMONS



An Egyptian Funeral Urn

it is absolutely known just what the picture meant to the Egyptians who made it. Smith's Abraham on the altar is but a common mummy upon its bier. The figure at his side to whom Smith has given a knife and whom he calls a priest of Elkenah is the Egyptian god Anubis, the protecting god of mummies. The four deities which Smith says are standing by the sacrificial altar, and for whom he has originated the names Elkenah, Mahmackrah, Korash and Pharaoh, are pictures of four jars which contained the soft part of the body when it was prepared for burial by the mummy-maker, and like all such jars, their covers were made in the forms of the heads of a man, a hawk, a jackal and a baboon, the four sons of the Egyptian god Horus. Such jars are found in abundance, and are to be seen in most collections of Egyptian antiquities. Pictures of them are frequently drawn on the papyri. The object which Smith calls Abraham in Egypt is simply a table covered with lotus flowers. The hawk which he describes as "the Angel of the Lord" is the Egyptian Horus, representing the soul of the dead man hovering over the body. Thus a mere glance at Smith's drawing, crude as it is, convinces the student of Egyptian burial customs that the Mormon prophet understood absolutely nothing of what he attempted to copy and to explain.

Another drawing in The Pearl of Great Price shows, so Smith says, Abraham seated on Pharaoh's throne. Behind him stands the king; before him is a prince of Pharaoh, the servant Shulem and a slave. Here Abraham, on the throne of Egypt, is said to be discoursing on the principles of astronomy. Above and below the picture are hieroglyphic characters. The original of Smith's crude drawing is a common stock picture from the tombs; its meaning is thoroughly understood. The seated figure is not Abraham, but the Egyptian god Osiris, before whom the dead were brought for judgment. Behind him stands his wife Isis, and before him, conducted by two figures, is the soul of the dead man. Again Smith mistakes a table covered with lotus blossoms for Abraham in Egypt.

The third drawing in Smith's Pearl of Great Price is a poor copy of the most common hypocephali, the little disks which were placed beneath the heads of the mummies as cushions, and which are therefore found in the greatest abundance. They are covered with stock pictures and with hieroglyphs containing selections of a hymn to the sun-god. Some of the hieroglyphs of Smith's copy are so crudely drawn that they are scarcely recognizable. Upon the disk, says Smith, is a picture of "God upon his throne, clothed with power and authority, with a crown of eternal light upon his head." Any student of Egyptology can see at a glance that it is but the Egyptian sun-god in his boat. The Mormon prophet's explanations of the other pictures on the disk are equally absurd, and his translation has not a vestige of truth in it. To call it self-delusion would be charitable indeed.

The Pearl of Great Price, unfortunately for the fame of the Mormon prophet, thus contains in itself tangible evidence, showing where it came from and how it came. It proclaims itself a fraud clearly and unmistakably, in terms which cannot be denied. What value, then, shall we place upon the word of the Mormon prophet when he tells us of other sacred Mormon books, that God dictated one of them to him orally, and that he copied another from plates of gold which an angel brought down to him from heaven? There is but one answer.

An Egyptian Funeral Urn

The Mormon Hieroglyphs

The three hieroglyphs on page 83 of this issue are referred to by Professor Banks in the foregoing article. Dr. Flinders-Petrie discredits Smith's interpretation of the central diagram, and says it is a well-known Egyptian hieroglyph, showing Anubis preparing the body of the dead; the bird is the hawk of Horus, the four gods (as Smith presumed them to be) are four funeral jars for use in embalming. The diagram to the right on page 83 was interpreted by Joseph Smith as follows: Fig. 1, the First Creation, nearest to the divine abode; Fig. 2, Olihah holding the key of power, as revealed to Abraham; Fig. 3, Kolob on his throne with the crown of eternal light upon his head, also the grand key-words of the priesthood as revealed to Adam in Eden; Fig. 4, the firmament; Fig. 5, Enish-go-on-dosh, the governing planet, said by Egyptians to be the sun. A number of the characters in this diagram were noted by Smith as mysteries yet to be revealed. The diagram on the left (page 83) is from the Berlin Museum collection. It is one of the common circular disks, thousands of which have been found under the heads of mummies in Egypt. They are stock hieroglyphs, used by embalmers for almost all entombments. The illustration on this page, showing five figures, is from the Book of Abraham and was interpreted by Joseph Smith as follows: Fig. 1, Abraham sitting on Pharaoh's throne, wearing a crown representing the priesthood; Fig. 2, Pharaoh; Fig. 3, emblem signifying Abraham in Egypt; Fig. 4, one of Pharaoh's princes; Fig. 5, Shulem a servant of Pharaoh; Fig. 6, Olimlah, a slave. Abraham discussing astronomy in the king's court. Of this remarkable interpretation, we need say nothing further than that Flinders-Petrie declares it is a very common scene, typifying the dead before the judgment seat of Osiris. The figures are: 1, Osiris; 2, Isis; 3, the stand of offerings; 4, the goddess Nebhat; 5, the dead person; 6, the god Anubis, the conductor of the souls of the dead.

THE CHURCH IN NEW CHINA

REV. WILLIAM P. CHALFONT, of the American Presbyterian Mission at Tsingchowfu, sends the accompanying photograph and the following interesting letter to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

"The photograph, taken by a local Chinese photographer, illustrates the change of sentiment toward the Christian Church that has taken place in China. It is taken in front of the fine new church edifice erected by the English Baptist Missionary Society as a fitting crown to the many years of service rendered at Tsingchowfu to the cause of Christ. It seats about one thousand people and, as this is the seat of the Union Theological College constituting part of Shantung University, the church is always nearly full.

"But the interest of the accompanying picture lies in the fact that the crowd there portrayed is largely made up of scholars and teachers from the public schools established by the republican government. The occasion was the presence in our midst of the Rev. Timothy Richard, D.D., LL.D., one of the pioneer missionaries of the English Baptist Society in this province, but now, for a number of years, the general secretary of the Christian Literature Society at Shanghai. Dr. Richard by his breadth of mind and consecrated energy has won a high place in the regard of the Chinese people, particularly the higher classes, with whom he has exceptional success.

"Hearing that Dr. Richard was revisiting the scene of former labors, the gentry of the city sent a delegation to ask for the use of the church in order to make some public expression of appreciation of what he has done. The local prefect occupied the chair. The main body of the church was occupied by students from the public schools. Even the newly organized Girls' School marched in and occupied a place beside the girls of the Baptist Mission. Two immense republican flags were crossed in front of the church and a detachment of soldiers guarded the gate. In the rear part of the church was placed a 'military band' from the garrison, consisting of ten bugles and three drums. When this band opened the meeting with 'military music' it sounded like the crack of doom. One missionary lady was observed to spring completely out of her seat!

"The prefect then made a little speech of welcome followed by a statement of what Dr. Richard has accomplished toward breaking down the barriers between Chinese and foreigners. This statement was made by Mr. Sung, a warm-hearted Christian who has been made the head of the Educational Bureau of this prefecture. Dr. Richard then arose and made an earnest and eloquent appeal for a foundation of true religion to be laid under the new government. When Dr. Richard sat down, an ex-official read a poem composed by himself in honor of Dr. Richard. He read it in a high, sing-song voice, with the effect of utterly destroying the gravity of the younger school children. The teacher of the primary school of the city had to lay his hand upon his new sword and look very fierce indeed before the unseemly levity was checked. The girls adopted the effective expedient of stuffing their sleeves into their mouths!

"Greetings were then in order from 'other nations.' The Rev. Mr. Nickalls was pitched upon to say a few words in behalf of England, and the writer was asked to perform a similar function for America. It is a strange fact that the remaining speech by a 'foreigner' was made by a representative of the Manchu garrison which for many decades had been quartered here.

"He spoke very well, indeed, making no reference to international matters, but paying a high tribute to Christianity. He said: 'I believe that faith in Christ furnishes the only hope for a successful solution of the problems that now confront us as a people.' The band then broke forth once more, after which we all went out and had our picture taken. It is that picture which I send you. You will observe Dr. Richard seated exactly in the middle of the lower rank, conspicuous by his white hair. To his right is the prefect, and at his left is the Manchu who made the last speech. We all feel that we have witnessed the triumph of the Gospel in Tsingchowfu, so far as the attitude of the ruling classes is concerned."

THE PROGRESS OF RELIEF IN MACEDONIA

IN THE course of the relief work which has kept the representatives of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Relief Committee at work through Macedonia and Thrace, Pastor Furnajieff has reached Salonica, and his last letter reaches us dated from that city. He outlines the conditions he has found in his trip through the Seres district. He says the destitution and suffering resulting from the war are almost indescribable. He continues:

"The Mohammedans have suffered a great deal, but the Christians have sustained considerably heavier losses both of life and property. It was in this connection that a prominent Greek lady of this city, Salonica, who is actively interested in the distribution of relief under the auspices of the Macedonian Relief Fund of London, England, said to me yesterday: 'I do not at all like to distribute to the Turks, because we have suffered so much at their hands, and their last act among us was to burn scores of villages and kill hundreds of Christians; but they are in such dire need that we must help them.' My reply to this was that we have our Master's golden rule, while they have never heard of it, and this is our opportunity to 'heap coals of fire.'

"The Relief Fund which we are dispensing for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S readers is distributed where the need is greatest without any consideration of the nationality or religious conviction of those helped. Last week we visited a large number of the devastated villages. Here we found in many instances that the inhabitants have no shelter, and so have flocked together wherever there is a village or a group of buildings left standing. For the most part the villages that were in part or entirely of Christians have been in part or wholly burnt, while most of the Turkish villages in the Seres district have been preserved, but even of these many have been pillaged. The population as a whole is reduced to the most abject poverty, and unless fed by charity and housed by the government, thousands of them must die before spring. They present a terrible appearance and are suffering intensely from the cold. Most of them fled with only such clothes as they could wear, and now they have nothing else. Their blankets and bedclothes have all been burned. When one appears among them as a stranger, who may possibly be able to give aid, their very appearance implores assistance.

"Let me underscore the following as a tribute to the hardiness and also the self-sacrifice of the Bulgarians and Christian Macedonians: When you ask them how they are planning to get along this winter they almost invariably answer, 'The Lord is good. he will provide for us some way, but if it is necessary that we should die from starvation that Macedonia may be free, let it be so.' Is not this a clear 'call from Macedonia' to send over and help us?

"Last week in the village of Simitli we distributed relief to the most destitute; to thirty-four widows, the poorest of the poor, who were without means to secure even one day's food, we distributed a dollar's worth of local coins and told them of the warm-hearted friends of theirs across the water who had been moved to send this help in the name of the Master, Jesus Christ. As they rose to their feet to go away, their 'Allah bin berekiat versun' (a thousand thanks to God) filled the air and would have done good to any heart to hear it. Others in the village received less, according to the need in each case."

In view of the urgent appeals by cable from Salonica, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has cabled the Relief Committee at Sofia, strongly recommending that $1,000 be devoted to relief work in and about the Greek city.

THE MEASURE OF A MAN

A SERMON

BY

Rev. David J. Burrell, D.D., LL.D.*

TEXT: "As a man thinketh in his heart, so is he." Prov. 23: 7

I DO not know you, and you do not know me. We are like unacquainted neighbors looking at each other through windows on opposite sides of the street. Nay, worse than that; we do not even see each other; we only see the respective houses that we live in. The tenant who is looking through these eyes and speaking with these lips is quite beyond your ken. How, then, shall you find him out?

How to measure a man; that is the question. It cannot be done with a foot-rule; because stature has little or nothing to do with it. If you use steelyards you will find so many pounds of bone and sinew and blood and adipose; but that is obviously not the substance of a man. Or suppose you analyze him chemically and put his component parts into bottles on a shelf; so much carbon in one, so much phosphorus in another, and so on; will that row of bottles hold your man? Well, then, let us measure him by his wealth. If you turn a boy's pocket inside out you will find a ball of string, a cork set with fish-hooks, a Barlow knife, et cetera; and when he grows up into a millionaire his pockets will hold only larger playthings, such as bonds, mortgages and yellow dust; millions it may be; but millions cannot make a man. We turn then to his genealogy. If you find an idler asleep under an oak, can you measure him by the oak? No more can you measure your man by his family tree. Well, there is nothing left but his crowns and his purple and tinsel gewgaws.

"The Hidden Man of the Heart"

These methods will not answer. In order to form a just estimate of man we must somehow get at himself and not the outer shell of circumstance that envelops him. The true mode of measurement is given by Solomon in our text: "As a man thinketh in his heart, so is he. The same idea is expressed by Isaac Watts when he says:

> Were I so tall to reach the pole
> Or grasp the ocean with my span,
> I must be measured by my soul;
> The mind's the standard of the man.

This is the way we measure God. "No man hath seen him at any time;" but his thoughts are all about us. "Thus saith the Lord; my thoughts are not your thoughts, neither are your ways my ways; for as the heavens are higher than the earth, so are my ways higher than your ways, and my thoughts than your thoughts." David sings, "O Lord, how great are thy works! and thy thoughts are very deep. How precious are thy thoughts unto me!" In like manner Paul pays tribute to the thoughts of the infinite mind, "O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out!" The stars of heaven, the rolling seas and the mountains are among his great thoughts. But oh, the riches of the infinite mind as revealed in his loving thoughts! His Word written for our guidance; his Word incarnated for our salvation; the Cross and the redeeming work that was wrought upon it; these are among his loving thoughts. Put all those thoughts together and you will have a just conception of God, who is otherwise past finding out.

As we are God's children we must needs be measured in the same way. To know a man you must do more than pass your hands over his face. You must get down into "the hidden man of the heart" and rummage among his thoughts; so shall you measure him, for "so is he."

> We live in deeds, not years; in thoughts, not breaths;
> In feelings, not in figures on a dial:
> We should count time by heart-throbs; he most lives
> Who thinks most, feels the noblest, acts the best.

Let it be understood, however, that the thoughts which thus define and reveal a man are not the dreams and reveries which merely skim his surface like zephyrs on a summer sea, but "the thoughts of his heart." The word "heart" is here used in its most comprehensive sense; it refers not merely to the emotional functions but to the brain and conscience and will. The whole man is doing this thinking; and the result is a code or series of deep convictions and principles which, on the one hand, define character and, on the other, furnish a working theory of life.

In the Revised Version our text is rendered, "As a man reckoneth within himself, so is he." In other words, his thinking is such a pondering on great problems that his whole life and character are influenced and dominated by it. This is no surface plowing for the raising of meadow grass, but a driving of the plowshare deep into the reality of things for a harvest of wheat. When the process is over the man does not say "I guess" but "I know; I believe; I am persuaded thus and so." His thoughts have become principles by being sealed with a Yea and Amen; and these constitute the man. If we were thoroughly familiar with these thoughts we should know the man. In order to do that, however, we must be in constant company with him. In that case we should perceive his thoughts in two different ways.

The Revelation of Words

To begin with, they express themselves in words; as it is written, "Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh."

It is not, however, by what a man says at any particular time that he uncovers himself. A merchant's stock-in-trade must not be judged by the display in his show window. I hear you repeat the Apostles' Creed: "I believe in God the Father Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth; and in Jesus Christ, his only Son, our Lord. I believe in the Holy Ghost, the holy Catholic Church, the communion of saints, the forgiveness of sin, the resurrection of the body, and the life everlasting. Amen." That sounds orthodox; but are you sure you mean it? The betrayal of the inner man is not by any single utterance but by one's entire vocabulary. If I could follow you about and listen at your home, in the market-place and wherever you have dealings with your fellow men; if I could hear what you are saying to yourself when your lips move as you pass along the street, I might thus be able to make a diagnosis of your character; for in the long run the tongue gives the heart away. It was with this in mind that the apostle James said, "If any man among you seem to be religious and bridleth not his tongue, but deceiveth his own heart, this man's religion is vain."

The Revelation of Action

The thoughts of the heart are also revealed by the deeds of a man. It is a true saying, "Actions speak louder than words."

But here again we are not to pass judgment on character by any particular act. A while ago a millionaire with a stroke of his pen endowed a college, and thereby set forces in motion which are destined to do good along the ages. Will you say, therefore, that he was thoroughly a good man? On the same day a husband, crazed by a "brainstorm" of jealousy, slew his familiar friend; for which he was sentenced to spend the remainder of his life behind prison bars. Will you say, therefore, that he was thoroughly a bad man? In either case your judgment would be superficial and wholly at fault. In order to determine with respect to the character of either of those or of any other man, you must get the sum total of his acts. You must follow him into the company of his wife and children, of his intimate friends and business associates, into all the relations of his life. Would you undertake to sell a house by furnishing a single brick as a sample of it? Look at your man. Follow him. Get his tout ensemble. Test him by the Decalogue. Then test him by the Sermon on the Mount. Then by the Beatitudes. Then by the Lord's Prayer. And before you are through with it, if you can only keep in his company long enough, you will find that "the hidden man of the heart" has come out into the open. It is unfortunate, however, that we are never long enough with any one to pass a clear judgment upon his character from the sum total of either his words or his deeds. But God is; he sees him and hears him every moment of the day and the night; and, therefore, he "knoweth him altogether." He makes no mistakes in judgment, because he is "acquainted with the secret imaginations of the heart of man." The thoughts of a man as thus reflected in speech and conduct make up his character.

The prevailing fault of our time is the estimating of manhood by the accidentals of life rather than by its essentials. Not what a man has or what happens to him; not wealth nor noble blood nor crowns nor titles; but the things that are in him and shining through him; his thoughts, motives, springs of action; these constitute the man.

And he is always consistent. It is said that "Consistency is a jewel"; but it is a pinchbeck jewel at best. In the last analysis there is no such thing as inconsistency. A man may, indeed, be out of gear with his profession. For that matter we all are. As Christians we never live up to our profession; if we did, what manner of persons we would be!

But how about non-Christians? I hear some one saying, "I cannot be inconsistent, because I make no profession." Oh, yes, you do, my friend. You make a very loud profession; and it behooves you to live up to it. You profess to believe that a man is wise enough to get along without asking light of God. You profess to believe that a man needs no Bible because his way is clear enough without it. You profess to believe that a man is strong enough to live uprightly without the church or Christian fellowship to lean on. You profess to believe that a man is good enough for heaven without relying on the Saviour to pardon his sins. And I charge you here and now with inconsistency. You have a creed and are not living up to it. You are neither wise enough nor strong enough nor good enough to point your finger at others who are, indeed, no better than they ought to be. "First pluck out the beam that is in thine own eye, and then shalt thou see clearly to pluck out the mote that is in thy brother's eye."

"Create in Me a Clean Heart"

The fact is, we are none of us any better than we ought to be. Christians profess not to be good, but to be trying to be good; and even with divine help they have a hard time of it. Non-Christians profess to be good enough without Christ; and they fall a long way short of it. "We are all John Thompson's bairns." We all alike "keep the word of promise to the ear but break it to the hope." That, however, is not the point. We are all inconsistent with our professions; but by the same token we are consistent with our principles and convictions; that is, with "the thoughts of our hearts." Wherefore, it behooves us to pray not so much that we may be consistent with our profession as that we may have clean hearts in the sight of God.

And just here we fall down; for "there is no difference; all have sinned and come short of the glory of God." This is conviction of sin, as it is written, "If our heart condemn us, God is greater than our heart and knoweth all things. If our heart condemn us not, then have we confidence toward God." It matters not by what criterion we judge ourselves, we find that we are not what we ought to be. If we look within, our hearts condemn us; if we look without, our friends and neighbors condemn us; in any case we have no recourse but to throw ourselves upon the mercy of God.

At this point the apostle Paul comes to the help of Solomon with this suggestion: "If there be therefore any consolation in Christ, if any comfort of love, if any fellowship of the Spirit, if any heart and mercy; let this mind be in you, which was also in Christ Jesus." This is the conclusion of the whole matter. We need Christ; we need him for the pardon of past sins; we need him for present duty; we need him for the hope of the future life. We need the mind that was in Christ Jesus so that we may be thinking his thoughts after him. As the only-begotten Son of God and the Firstborn among many brethren, he was, by reason of "the thoughts of his heart," well pleasing in the sight of God.

In our text Solomon lays down general principles

THE EGYPTIAN LACE-WOMAN

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

HEAR the call of the sun-kissed sand,
And I hear the wail of the sea,
I walk the streets in a foreign land,
Where never a friend can be.
ie buildings loom high above me,
And I shut my eyes from the glare;
, is there a God to love me,
And is there a soul to care?

old my wares in my hand to show,
But every one passes by;
id I see as I look that they do not know,
And will not heed my cry.
I shut my eyes from the bustling throng,
And I feel the soft breeze blow,
I look o'er the stretch of the desert long,
Where the vultures circle low.

, sweet is the smell of the spices,
And soft is the feel of the sand;
it a voice is asking for prices
In the tongue of this stranger land.
Vilt buy, my lady? God bless thee!
Now, Allah, look down from on high;
ay the favor of heaven caress thee,
And be near until thou die."

r every coin shall be laid away
That I earn on this little stand, ll at last shall come the happy day
When I sail for my native land, here the only gold worth keeping
Is the gleam of the sand I love;
here coldness is ever sleeping,
And God is enthroned above.

The Measure of a Man or the measurement of a man; but aul goes further; he makes a specic application of those principles hen he points to Christ, saying, "Be ou like him." Here, then, is the ecret of right living: to bring ourelves into harmony with the thinking f Christ.

So let us examine ourselves. Do e think of God as Christ thought of im? Do we think of life as Christ id—not as an handbreadth of time ut an interminable series of infinite ons for which we are preparing ere and now? Do we think of the ible as Christ thought of it, who new and loved it, preached and pracced it, and never uttered a word or yllable against it? Do we think of he Cross as he thought of it; not as n accident befalling a martyr but as necessity laid upon the sinless Son f God for the deliverance of sinners rom the awful grip of sin? Are hese our heart thoughts? If in this anner the mind that was in Christ esus be also in us, so that we regard he great verities of the spiritual life s he did, and so that our thoughts re framed into great principles and onvictions as his were, then our peech will "betray us," and our light ill "so shine that men, seeing our ood works, shall glorify God."

It is a great thing to be brought hus into vital touch with Christ. It s life and immortality. For, so living, we lose, as it were, our identity n him; and our lives are "hid with Christ in God." Here, then, is our rayer:

Lord, make me like thyself;
Lord, make me be myself;
Seeming as one who lives to thee,
And being what I seem to be!

LIFE IN THE SMALL TOWN

IT IS an odd habit people have of poking fun at small towns. Why there should be any humor in the fact of a town's being small is a question that puzzles people who live in it and any one outside who really sets himself to think it out.

Newspaper reporters from big cities always have a merry time when some great tragedy or mystery or crime centers about a little town and they are sent out to "cover" the news. They jest over the fact that the unheard-of town has now been "put on the map"; they describe the cut, or the uncut, of the sheriff's whiskers; they ridicule the doctor's buggy; they caricature the parson; they fasten a bit of nonsense on the postmaster. They seem to consider it their duty to make fun of everybody who happens to live in a small town. Why?

WELL, of course, there are some things in some small towns that strike some city people humorously. It does happen in some small towns that some people do not wear precisely the same kind and cut of clothes seen in the big cities, and some forms of speech are strange, and some forms of thought surprising. But from the beginning of civilization until now it has always been true that the little towns contain people of the same rank of intelligence, the same standard of culture, the same breadth of interest as the people of the cities. Read Old Town Folks, and catch the charm of the dwellers in that delightful spot. There were funny characters there, to be sure, but so there are funny characters on every city block. Where, in all literature, can one find greater and more noble souls than that little group of Drumtochty friends—Marget Howe and Dr. McClure, Domsie, Geordie, and sad, patient, faithful Drumsheugh?

I AM thinking now of one of the loveliest places in the world, a tiny village in western New Jersey, where I spent three delicious boyhood years. When I go back now, instead of thinking that those dear old friends are behind the times or off the road of progress, I am amazed at their alertness and genuine culture. Two men I think of especially—one of them will give you the best ideas about the fundamentals of music, while he will discuss theology and social progress in a way to make your city man sit up and think hard; the other will charm you with literature and philosophy and the most irresistible laughter till you wonder if, after all, there is any such place as New York; or, if there is, why any one should go there. You have heard of the Adirondack guide who asked the stranger where he lived and said, when he heard the reply, "New York," "How can you stand it to live so far away?"

I should like to stop to tell you of our schoolmaster of those early days—dead only recently, and leaving a big gap in many a heart. I should like to describe how, around the organ in the old schoolhouse, we used to sing of a little village, which seemed to every one of us to be the very one in which, or near which, we dwelt:

Little vale with fairy meadows,
Trees that spread their leafy hands,
Flowers clothed in softest beauty,
Lovelier than Eastern lands!

I cannot refrain from mentioning two other wonderful friends whom I found dwelling in a little cottage in the fields outside a diminutive village on the west coast of the Isle of Bute in Scotland. Sir Daniel—though neither queen nor king has thought of knighting him—will talk to you of books and travel till you begin to wonder if you yourself have ever read anything or gone anywhere. And as for the tea and toast, Mistress Flora will make you over the coals in her sitting-room—well, you must find your way across that meadow to Kulevin to find out.

DID you ever stop to think that when the great Master of men began his work of capturing the world he chose among his twelve helpers three fishermen and a tax collector who lived at the little town of Capernaum; two others men who lived in the village of Bethsaida across the lake; another who lived at Cana. The dwelling places of the others are not known, but only two are thought to have come from cities—Luke and Thomas, who are said to have been born at Antioch. The Master himself came from the village of Nazareth; and as to the place in which he was born, shall we ever tire of singing:

O little town of Bethlehem!
How still we see thee lie!

THE charm and glory of living in a small town or in the country is a lesson the American people need to re-learn. It has been said that one of the striking differences between England and America is that when an American gets rich he hurries to move into the city and when an Englishman gets rich he hurries to move into the country. The size of the town you live in has nothing whatever to do with the fact of your being or not being "provincial." Think of the books and poems that have been written, the sermons that have been preached, the prayers that have been made in country places that have influenced the world! Most of the great colleges and universities are in small towns. It is good to go to the city now and then; it does no harm to live in it for a while. But there is no serious disadvantage in living in the country and there are a thousand advantages. The daily paper makes you a citizen of the world; magazines and books make you a student in the school of life; the Sabbath service and the weekly prayer-meeting make you a part of the church universal; the post office will send to the most distant mission station the money order by which you can help hasten the coming of Christ's kingdom. At work in your kitchen or in your store or field, or strolling under the trees, or kneeling by your bedside, you may link yourself by prayer to the forces which are transforming the world and controlling the universe and thus create part of those golden chains by which this little world is bound "about the feet of God."

UNQUESTIONING

I WILL not falter: thou dost know
The way in which my feet must go;
With thee all faith and all desire
Must pass that sea of glass and fire.

I will not falter; in thy hand
I lay my own; at thy command
To tread the wilderness were sweet,
O'er burning stones with bleeding feet.

I will not falter, but fulfil
The purposes thy heavenly will Reveals to me, as day by day
This marvelous life unfolds its way.

I will not falter; thought is free,
And all my faith looks up to thee;
The mount of vision gleams afar,
And o'er it shines the Bethlehem star!

Is Sinlessness Possible?

PROFESSOR DAVID SMITH, in the British Weekly, discusses the much-vexed question of possible perfection in this life, basing his comments on I. John 1: 8; 3: 6 and related passages. He writes:

Observe at the outset that the statement in 1: 8 must be accepted in its simplicity and entirety. It is an emphatic condemnation of Perfectionism—a heresy which evinces ignorance at once of the plague of one's heart and of the remedy which God has furnished in our Lord Jesus Christ. No saint was ever a Perfectionist. Thomas à Kempis mourned that he found it impossible to live even a single day without sin. When St. John declares that "if we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves," he is stating a truth to which the Christian heart contritely consents. Nor is it contradicted by his subsequent statements that "whosoever abideth in him sinneth not: whosoever sinneth, hath not seen him, neither known him"; and "whosoever is born of God sinneth not." And I think you will perceive this if you observe his language. (1) Distinguish "to have sin" and "to sin." In the former it is the sinful principle that is denoted, and in the latter its manifestation in specific acts. The apostle's doctrine is that the sinful principle is in our nature; its taint is in our blood. The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ is the medicine; but the process of cleansing and healing is gradual, and we frequently "sin." "If we say that we have not sinned, we make him a liar, and his Word is not in us." (2) The "sins" of the regenerate man are the outbreaks of his lingering corruption. They are occasional acts, not settled habits. The sinful principle remains, and it manifests its presence by lapses from holiness, definite, isolated acts of sin. This is expressed in 2: 1, where the apostle uses the Greek aorist, denoting a definite act—"that ye sin not," "if any man sin." In 3: 6 and 5: 18 he uses the present tense, denoting continuance in sin (Rom. 6: 1). It is precisely synonymous with "doeth sin" in 3: 4 (R.V); and its force, as distinguished from that of the aorist, is brought out by the somewhat awkward rendering: "Whosoever abideth in him doth not keep on sinning: whosoever keepeth on sinning hath not seen him, neither knoweth him"; "whosoever is born of God doth not keep on sinning." It is a pregnant saying that "a prisoner of war is not a deserter." It may happen to a Christian to be wounded and taken prisoner; and it may even be that the disaster is due to his own negligence; nevertheless, he is no traitor if his heart remains true to its allegiance, if he mourns his captivity and is fain to escape and retrieve his disgrace. It would be quite otherwise if he voluntarily went over to the enemy and were content to remain in the enemy's camp. That would be "keeping on sinning"; and "whosoever keepeth on sinning hath not seen him, neither knoweth him." There is fresh mercy in Christ for each new sin that springs out of our indwelling corruption (2: 1). And we are still his, despite our worst failure, so long as our hearts keep desiring him and hating the sin which is too strong for us.

A GREAT CITY'S NEW GATEWA

NOW, think big!

Think in hundreds of tons of steel and iron, marble and granite, thousands of railway cars, millions of people and many millions of dollars. Think of the mighty tide of commerce that ebbs and flows through New York's northern gateway—the gateway to her Westchester suburbs, through which pours all her railway traffic with New England and a large part of that with Canada and the West. In the first of these things are the raw materials for the world's greatest railway terminal. In the last is the reason for its being. Add now the highest engineering skill this land of engineers has produced, the soul of an artist and the acumen of a master business man, and beneath the magic flame of progress there grows up in the midst of America's metropolis the new Grand Central Station.

About five years ago the first tremors of demolition ran through the old station, and it became known that the splendid terminal which Commodore Vanderbilt opened to the public in 1871 had been outgrown and must give place to a still vaster building. Before this decision reached the public two staggering problems had been met and solved. The first was "How shall we get more room for tracks here in the heart of the city, where each square foot of land must be almost covered with gold coins as its purchase price?" The second was "How shall we tear down this station, put the new one in its place and still keep trains going in and out at the rate of one every five minutes during the day?"

The first problem was answered by electricity. The installation of electric engines marked the passing of the old-fashioned puffing, smoking railway yard and made possible the plan of building tracks on two levels, one above the other and still both below the street level. The answer to the second problem stretched its tortuous length over the entire five years of building.

When additional property had been acquired, bringing the total area up to forty-six and one-half acres, the stupendous task of excavation began. First, at the eastern side, next Lexington Avenue, the new levels were reached and some of the trains began to run in there. So, gradually working westward, one section after another of the old yard disappeared beneath the diamond drills of the contractors. Gradually the two new levels, upon which the trains now run and which bring the total area of the station up to seventy-nine acres, and give room for the thirty-three miles of track which it contains, were completed. The digging out of that great gash in the earth sounds very simple until one stops to consider that the earth and stone taken from it comprised three million two hundred thousand cubic yards—that this amount of material would build an island with perpendicular sides as high as the Statue of Liberty and six acres in extent, and still there would be enough granite left to build a good-sized castle on the top.

From the point of view of New York as a city one of the most important phases of this new development has been the restoration to the use of the general public of many blocks which were formerly used as railway yards. Thousands of tons of steel and concrete now support the streets which cross above the wonderful underground system of tracks, and fronting upon these restored thoroughfares there is growing a series of beautiful white marble buildings, uniform in architecture and height. In these magnificent structures there are housed the principal offices of the railway company, a wonderful new hotel—the Biltmore—the New York Furniture Exchange, the New Grand Central Palace, a theater, a splendid Y. M. C. A. and many other business and social enterprises. When this civic center is completed thirty-two blocks in all will have been covered by these impressive white buildings. To realize what this change means one has only to contrast a twenty-three-acre railway yard where dozens of engines fill the air with steam and smoke with quiet blocks of white marble buildings where luxuriant motor cars stand before hotels, apartment houses and clubs.

Two well-known firms of architects collaborated on the designs for the station building of the new terminal. At their direction there has risen an edifice that is both dignified and beautiful. High arches and straight classic lines give the impression of stability and repose, and the decorative figures are worked in so as to please and relieve rather than obtrude themselves upon the eye. The combination of granite and Indiana limestone, of which the exterior is composed, gives a tint of warm gray and softens what might have been repelling in its austerity into a well-toned, reposeful and inviting picture. The classic idea of a gateway to the city seems to have dominated the architect's plans and designs. Our cities no longer have walls whose portals may be made into triumphal arches or commemorative objects of beauty. The railway station has become our chief gate, and it seems almost an inspiration that prompted the designing of the central portion of the façade in the form of a triumphal arch. High over the front of this arch there stands a wonderful white marble group which is a monument to the glory of commerce as typified by Mercury, supported by physical and mental energy—Hercules and Minerva. One of the architects said in this connection: "All to attest that this great enterprise has grown and exists not merely from the wealth expended nor by the revenue derived but by the brain and brawn constantly centered upon its development for nearly a century."

The New Grand Central Terminal Group of Buildings in New York

From Forty-first Street and Park Avenue a new viaduct is planned to carry the traffic from down town over Forty-second Street to the new elevated streets that are being built as a part of the terminal. These elevated roadways are calculated to be of infinite benefit to the city as well as to the operation of the great terminal. They form a connecting link between Park Avenue above the station and the same street below, opening this thoroughfare to the public. From the railway officials' viewpoint, they add greatly to the terminal by allowing the unceasing stream of carriages and automobiles to reach a point where they may deposit passengers and luggage within the station itself.

The interior of the new station presents not only a scene of remarkable beauty for a commercial building, but has every possible convenience and facility to aid the traveler on his goings and comings. The new building has four different levels. The lowest of these will be devoted entirely to the handling of baggage, and here the public will not be allowed. Next above that will come the suburban level, where a splendid white marble room gives entrance to the thirty-three tracks which carry the suburban traffic. Here are to be found all the facilities for the purchase of tickets, the checking of baggage and the securing of necessary information. Here too are all the usual newsdealers and confectionery and flower stands. This suburban section of the station has its own rest room for ladies and smoking-room for men. Every possible need of the rushing commuter has been carefully provided for; through this his own half of the terminal he may make his hurried way to business in the morning and home again at night without coming in contact with the usually slower moving long-distance express passengers. From this complete station, which is in itself as large as those of many cities of the first rank, gently inclined passageways called "ramps" lead to the main station on the level above.

Here is the great concourse and main waiting-room of the terminal, with the gates that give upon the forty-one tracks over which the express train service is carried on. Then on the level of Forty-second Street, and looking down upon the main floor of the concourse, is the long white gallery to which the name, "The Kissing Gallery," has already been given, for this is the place of departure, and here those coming to the station to see friends start upon a journey must say good-by. The great concourse, where thirty thousand people may stand at one time without in the least crowding one another, is one of the most beautiful apartments of its kind in the world. At each end three high arched windows let in a flood of light. Its ceiling is so high and its floor space so vast that New York's old City Hall, one of the best known pieces of classic colonial architecture in America, could be put down comfortably inside and still there would be a few feet left between the top of its cupola and the roof. A few days ago some men were climbing about the staging way up there, putting the finishing touches to the decorative designs. At one end the staging was already coming down and a friendly guide said: "There comes $14,000 worth of junk, for that is what the staging cost, and very little of its material can ever be used again."

Repeated here are all those conveniences for the traveler that appear in the suburban section. Tickets and luggage may be attended to as one passes along, for the convenience of the public has not been overlooked in the desire for beauty. From the waiting rooms there open beautiful rest rooms for both men and women. Here, too, there are barber shops—a private one if you wish!—manicure parlors, baths, and private dressing-rooms. Here milady will find a maid to do her hair in the latest mode, and another to polish her shoes. Here "me lord" may have a valet to clean and press his clothes, to help him to dress and sally forth, the stains of travel left behind.

On the subway level there has been completed an attractive restaurant with ceiling of low-vaulted arches in beautiful tiles. As the workmen were putting the finishing touches on this room a little party of sight-seers climbed over boards and stagings to look down at the real marvel of this new station. This final key to the handling of the vast traffic for which the station is planned is a loop of tracks on each of the levels whereby the trains as they come into one side of the station and discharge their human freight may be pulled, without switching, round to the other side, where, when they have been cleaned, they are ready to go out again. The advantage of this arrangement becomes apparent when it is remembered that before the new station was completed all the trains which came down through the long tunnel that connects the Grand Central with the outskirts of the city had to be taken back over the same tracks to a yard out in the suburbs to be cleaned, then hauled once more down to the station for their next trip. This meant that the tracks in the tunnel were used many hours of the day for the hauling of empty cars. Now this is done away with, and over the loops which connect the incoming and the outgoing tracks three thousand three hundred trains per day could be moved. Allowing each one of these to be of the average length and each car fully occupied, it would take about six weeks for the entire population of the United States to pass through this, the world's greatest railway station.

POLLYANNA

CHAPTER XX

An Accident

AT MRS. SNOW'S request, Pollyanna went one day to Dr. Chilton's office to get the name of a medicine which Mrs. Snow had forgotten. As it chanced, Pollyanna had never before seen the inside of Dr. Chilton's office.

"Oh, I've never been to your home before! This is your home; isn't it?" she cried.

The doctor smiled a little sadly.

"Yes—such as 'tis," he answered; "but they're just rooms, that's all—not a home."

Pollyanna nodded her head wisely. "I know. It takes a woman's hand and heart, or a child's presence to make a home," she said.

"Eh?" The doctor wheeled about abruptly.

"Mr. Pendleton told me," nodded Pollyanna again, "about the woman's hand and heart, or the child's presence, you know. Why don't you get a woman's hand and heart, Dr. Chilton?"

Dr. Chilton laughed a little constrainedly, and turned to his desk.

"Oh—and I forgot," said Pollyanna. "I suppose I ought to tell you. It wasn't Aunt Polly that Mr. Pendleton loved long ago; and so we—we aren't going there to live. You see, I told you it was—but I made a mistake. I hope you didn't tell any one," she finished anxiously.

"No—I didn't tell any one, Pollyanna," replied the doctor, a little queerly.

"But why don't you get a woman's hand and heart, Dr. Chilton?"

There was a moment's silence; then very gravely the doctor said:

"They're not always to be had—for the asking, little girl."

Pollyanna frowned thoughtfully.

"But I should think you could get 'em," she argued. The flattering emphasis was unmistakable.

"Thank you," laughed the doctor, with uplifted eyebrows. Then, gravely again: "I'm afraid some of your older sisters would not be quite so—confident. At least, they—they haven't shown themselves to be so—obliging," he observed.

Pollyanna frowned again. Then her eyes widened in surprise.

"Why, Dr. Chilton, you don't mean—you didn't try to get somebody's hand and heart once, like Mr. Pendleton, and—couldn't; did you?"

The doctor got to his feet a little abruptly.

"There, there, Pollyanna, never mind about that now. Suppose you run back to Mrs. Snow. I've written down the name of the medicine, and the directions how she is to take it."

It was on the last day of October that the accident occurred. Pollyanna, hurrying home from school, crossed the road at an apparently safe distance in front of a swiftly approaching motor car.

Just what happened, no one could seem to tell afterward. Pollyanna, however, at five o'clock, was borne, limp and unconscious, into the little room that was so dear to her. There, by a white-faced Aunt Polly and a weeping Nancy she was undressed tenderly and put to bed, while from the village, hastily summoned by telephone, Dr. Warren was hurrying as fast as another motor car could bring him.

"And ye didn't need ter more'n look at her aunt's face," Nancy was sobbing to Old Tom in the garden, "ter see that 'twan't no duty that was eatin' her. Yer hands don't shake, and yer eyes don't look as if ye was tryin' ter hold back the angel o' Death himself, when you're jest doin' yer duty, Mr. Tom—they don't, they don't!"

"Is she hurt—bad?" The old man's voice shook.

"There ain't no tellin'," sobbed Nancy. "She lay back that white an' still she might easy be dead; but Miss Polly said she wan't dead."

"But where is she hurt?"

"I don't know," moaned Nancy. "There's a little cut on her blessed head, but 'tain't bad—that ain't—Miss Polly says. She says she's afraid it's infernally she's hurt."

A faint flicker came into Old Tom's eyes.

"I guess you mean internally, Nancy," he said dryly. "She's hurt infernally, all right—plague take that autymobile!—but I don't guess Miss Polly'd be usin' that word, all the same."

"Eh? Well, I don't know, I don't know," moaned Nancy with a shake of her head as he turned away.

Even after the doctor was gone, however, there seemed to be little that Nancy could tell Mr. Tom. There appeared to be no bones broken, and the cut was of slight consequence; but the doctor had looked very grave, had shaken his head slowly, and had said that time alone could tell. A trained nurse had been sent for, and would come that night. That was all. And Nancy turned sobbingly, and went back to her kitchen.

Just what happened no one could seem to tell afterward

It was some time during the next forenoon that Pollyanna opened conscious eyes and realized where she was.

"Why, Aunt Polly, what's the matter? Isn't it daytime? Why don't I get up?" she cried. "Why, Aunt Polly, I can't get up," she moaned, falling back on the pillow, after an ineffectual attempt to lift herself.

"No, dear, I wouldn't try—just yet," soothed her aunt quickly, but very quietly.

"But what is the matter? Why can't I get up?"

"You were hurt, dear, by the automobile last night. But never mind that now. Auntie wants you to rest and go to sleep again."

"Hurt? Oh, yes; I—I ran." Pollyanna's eyes were dazed. She lifted her hand to her forehead. "Why, it's—done up, and it—hurts!"

"Yes, dear; but never mind. Just—just rest."

"But, Aunt Polly, I feel so funny, and so bad! My legs feel so—so queer—only they don't feel—at all!"

With an imploring look into the nurse's face, Miss Polly struggled to her feet, and turned away. The nurse came forward quickly.

"Suppose you let me talk to you now," she began cheerily. "I'm sure I think it's high time we were getting acquainted, and I'm going to introduce myself. I am Miss Hunt, and I've come to help your aunt take care of you. And the very first thing I'm going to do is to ask you to swallow these little white pills for me."

Pollyanna's eyes grew a bit wild.

"But I don't want to be taken care of—that is, not for long! I want to get up. You know I go to school. Can't I go to school to-morrow?"

From the window where Aunt Polly stood now there came a half stifled cry.

"To-morrow?" smiled the nurse, brightly. "Well, I may not let you out quite so soon as that, Miss Pollyanna. But just swallow these little pills for me, please, and we shall see what they'll do!"

"All right," agreed Pollyanna, somewhat doubtfully; "but I must go to school day after to-morrow—there are examinations then, you know."

She spoke again, a minute later. She spoke of school, and of the automobile, and of how her head ached; but very soon her voice trailed into silence under the blessed influence of the little white pills she had swallowed.

CHAPTER XXI

John Pendleton

POLLYANNA did not go to school "to-morrow" nor the "day after to-morrow." Pollyanna, however, did not realize this, except momentarily when a brief period of full consciousness sent insistent questions to her lips. Pollyanna did not realize anything, in fact, very clearly, until a week had passed; then the fever subsided, the pain lessened somewhat, and her mind awoke to full consciousness. She had then to be told all over again what had occurred.

"And so it's hurt that I am, and not sick," she sighed at last. "Well, I'm glad of that."

"G—glad, Pollyanna?" asked her aunt, who was sitting by the bed.

"Yes. I'd so much rather have broken legs like Mr. Pendleton's than lifelong invalids like Mrs. Snow, you know. Broken legs get well, and lifelong invalids don't."

Miss Polly—who had said nothing whatever about broken legs—did not answer. Her face was white and drawn.

On the bed Pollyanna lay blinking at the dancing band of colors on the ceiling, which came from one of the prisms in the window.

"I'm glad 'tisn't smallpox that ails me, too," she murmured contentedly. "That would be worse than freckles. And I'm glad 'tisn't whooping cough—I've had that, and it's horrid—and I'm glad 'tisn't appendicitis nor measles, 'cause they're catching—measles are, I mean—and they wouldn't let you stay here."

"You seem to—to be glad for a good many things, my dear," faltered Aunt Polly, putting her hand to her throat as if her collar bound.

Pollyanna laughed softly.

"I am. I've been thinking of 'em—lots of 'em—all the time I've been looking up at that rainbow. I'm so glad Mr. Pendleton gave me those prisms!

Arbitration and the Canal

THERE are crises in the life of a nation, as of an individual, when choice has to be made between material interest and high principle. We have reached such a point in our dispute with England over the Panama Canal tolls. Stated briefly, the situation on both sides is this: Britain contends that the new American law giving our coastwise vessels the right to pass through the Canal free, while all other shipping pays toll, is violative of the treaty between that government and ourselves, which pledged that there should be no discrimination between our own and foreign shipping in the new waterway across the Isthmus. The American contention is that all the conditions have materially changed since the Clayton-Bulwer and Hay-Pauncefote treaties were signed; we had not then obtained sovereign rights over the Isthmus, which has since become a portion of the territory of this nation. It is also pointed out that our sovereignty in the Isthmus operates under international law to make any treaty framed before that sovereignty was acquired, "voidable," although it does not actually make it void, and this on the ground of changes in the fundamental conditions existing at the time of the treaty.

This may be good law and good logic; but is it the wisest course for us to follow? Does it conform to the American ideal of national honor and the sacredness of a treaty pledge? No government is disposed to question our sovereignty, or our right to protect and defend a canal within our own territory. But while conditions have changed, the moral responsibility remains, and it is one that cannot be altered, modified, or effaced, save by mutual consent of the parties interested. Ex-Senator George F. Edmunds, our foremost Constitutional authority, writes that the equality of tolls pledged in the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty was, as everybody knows, the consideration made to Great Britain for releasing us from the supposed obligations of the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty. He adds, "If we have made a bad bargain, we are bound by every consideration, as well of expediency as of justice, to stand by it."

There is still another treaty, which should not be overlooked, by which we stand pledged to submit any differences that may arise between Great Britain and ourselves over treaty interpretation to the adjudication of the Hague Tribunal. If the present differences can be settled by negotiation without arbitration—well and good; if not, the only honorable path that remains is the path to The Hague. Far better to lose an advantage for the sake of right than to gain one by doing wrong. The Panama Canal is ours; we have built it with our own money; now let us administer it with a large and high-principled generosity, keeping our honor clean and our pledges inviolate. Nothing but evil can come of the adoption of a course which would bring disrepute to this country among the governments of the world. We have been the foremost advocate of arbitration and have helped to settle the disputes of others by that means; now let us show our belief in our own doctrine by applying it to the Panama Canal dispute.

Judicial Corruption Rebuked

FEW recent acts of the United States Senate have given more general satisfaction than the conviction and removal from the bench of the Commerce Court of Judge Robert W. Archbald. Sitting as a court of impeachment, the Senate found the accused guilty on five out of the thirteen charges against him. After hearing all the evidence, it unanimously sentenced him to removal from office, and declared him utterly disqualified forever from holding any post of honor, trust or profit under our government. He was shown to have made a corrupt use of his influence as a judge in railroad cases brought before the court over which he presided; he conducted an improper correspondence with counsel for railroads without the knowledge of his associates on the bench; he used his official position to promote certain corrupt coal deals and to influence the railroads. His has been the ninth impeachment trial in the nation's history and the briefest. The awakened sentiment of the people demanded that the Senate purge the judicial bench from the presence of an official who, while he may not have profited personally by his own misconduct, made corruption easy, and having no standard of official conduct himself, dragged down the dignity of his high office to the lowest level. His swift degradation is a wholesome warning to other judges who may be disposed to loose methods and improper practices. It was, in effect, a practical illustration of the value of the recall, and shows what may take place in the case of any judge who prostitutes his office and imagines himself beyond the reach of punishment because he has been cunning enough to avoid breaking the statutory law.

Concerning the "Money Trust"

TWENTY-TWO and one-quarter billions of dollars under the practical control of three men! The startling fact stated recently by Mr. George F. Baker before the Pujo committee at Washington may be sifted down to that almost incredible proposition.

Mr. Baker, toward the close of his testimony, declared frankly: "I think it has gone far enough. It might not be dangerous, but still it has gone about far enough. In good hands, I do not see that it would do any harm. If it got into bad hands it would be very bad."

There are altogether one hundred and twelve corporations, administered by three hundred and forty-one directors, in the group at whose head stand the three financiers paramount, J. P. Morgan, James Stillman and George F. Baker. Mr. Stillman is sixty-three years old, Mr. Baker seventy, Mr. Morgan seventy-three. The American people must face with the most intense seriousness the question: "Who will control this almost incomprehensibly great sum of money when these men are gone?"

It appears perfectly self-evident that some plan must be devised for preventing further concentration of the nation's wealth. So long as competition remains the basis of our commercial system, legislation should prevent the possibility of the same men controlling the policy and detail management of competing banks, trust companies, and, to an ever-increasing extent, the various enterprises of manufacture, transportation, and barter. There should be full publicity of the methods, control and conditions of banks and trust companies.

Other reforms will suggest themselves. Meanwhile the nation must be finding its way to a saner and more righteous economic system. All thoughtful people realize that we are in a period of transition. This startling concentration has been, perhaps, an almost necessary outcome of the conditi under which we have been working. But th conditions are not final; the social evolution is le ing us beyond them. There need be no revolutic there need be no disastrous unsettling of busin conditions. But there must be change, and t change must be the result of brave, patient, sa just, philanthropic thinking and doing.

The Balkan Relief Work

IT HAS fallen to the lot of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers to bring solace and comfort to Christians, Mohammedans, and even skeptics here in the Balkans, after the most complete loss of all they had through the war." This passage is from a letter just received from Pastor Furnajieff, the chairman of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Balkan Relief Committee at Sofia, Bulgaria. That committee, to which we have been sending regular weekly remittances by cable, is doing an excellent work, which as the chairman's letter indicates, is not confined to any religion, but takes in Turk and Bulgar, Greek and Servian. Many a home in the Balkans where starvation and suffering reigned, has cause to bless the generous-hearted Americans who have sent them help through this means. Should the war be resumed, as now seems probable, the suffering may be greatly increased. Let us not relax our effort to be of service to those innocent victims, who are non-combatants. We shall continue to help them and to assist the widows, the orphans, and the destitute as long as the urgent need exists and the way is open.

A Mormon "Sacred Book" on Trial

LESS than two years ago, Elder Brigham Roberts, one of the ablest defenders of Mormonism, made a statement that the Mormon Books "must submit to every test, literary criticism with the rest. . . . The book is flung down into the world's mass of literature and here it is; we proclaim it true, and the world has the right to test it to the uttermost in every possible way." Now, the world has taken him at his word and has tested the validity of the Book of Abraham. A group of eminent Orientalists, including Dr. A. H. Sayce of Oxford, England, Dr. Flinders-Petrie of London University, Professor James H. Breasted of Chicago University, Dr. Arthur C. Mace of the Metropolitan Museum of New York, Dr. John Peters of the University of Pennsylvania, Professor C. A. B. Mercer of Western Theological Seminary, Dr. Edward Meyer of the University of Berlin, and Professor Von Bessing of the University of Munich, have examined the hieroglyphic illustrations in the Book of Abraham. These distinguished men, each of whom has large experience in Egyptian research and Oriental literature, united in pronouncing Joseph Smith's translations absurd and inaccurate throughout. Dr. Mace calls the Book of Abraham "a pure fabrication" and Professor Mercer says the translations of Joseph Smith are "undoubtedly the work of pure imagination." These expert opinions from the highest sources are now supplemented by a remarkable article from the pen of Professor Edgar J. Banks, whose contributions on archeology (many of which have appeared in this journal) have been the product of a lifetime of exploration and study.

Right Rev. F. S. Spalding, Bishop of the Diocese of Utah, through whose instrumentality the whole question of the validity of Joseph Smith's translations has been publicly raised, writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

> My object in writing the pamphlet was not to inform the world that Joseph Smith's translations were inaccurate, and that therefore his claim to be a prophet of God was invalid, but to try to convince the Mormons themselves of those facts. The rest of the world has long ago made up its mind. Writing and action, which can be described as "attack," no more affects the Mormon in his belief than they affected the early Christians in theirs. The value of the pamphlet and the literature which may grow out of it is to be measured entirely by its effect upon the Latter Day Saints.

This is a very generous attitude. Bishop Spalding is simply taking Elder Roberts at his word and submitting the Mormon literature to the highest test. To an unbiased mind, the result is conclusive. But, while the world may have a passing interest in the discussion, to the Mormons themselves it should be a vital issue. Will their faith stand the shock of such revelations?

Garment Workers' Strike Parade

IT IS estimated that fifty thousand garment makers on strike marched in the parade in New York City January 13. It was one of the most remarkable demonstrations of the kind ever witnessed in the city, partly on account of the number of men and women in it, and partly on account of the splendid order maintained. Though sentiment was burning at white heat in the hearts of those marching in the parade, there was perfect self-possession and peace in the outward demeanor. In Union Square a number of speeches were made, the most notable one being that of Mrs. Rose Pastor Stokes. These are some of the mottoes on the banners: "We are striving for a better life." "We want better sanitary conditions." "Eight hours for work, eight for sleep, and eight for play." "We are striking for the abolition of child labor." "In union there is strength." "We want justice in the courts." "We have only our chains to lose and the world to gain." One bore a loaf of bread stuck on the end of a pole, bearing these words: "We want to eat, but we can't get food." By a vote of 11,873 to 542 the members of the Ladies' Waistmakers' Union determined to join the strike. It is expected that this will bring the number of the strikers in the woman's garment industry up to 65,000. Added to the 110,000 workers said to be out in the men's garment strike, these would make 175,000 out on the strike. While the great parade was going on, the manufacturers allied with the New York Clothing Trade Association were holding a meeting and resolving that they would not yield to the demands of the strikers and that they would not talk of any proposition of settlement that did not involve an open shop. In our enormously prosperous times we are confronted with new, with tragical problems. Employees have a right to quit work, to quit at the same time, and where there are no lawless demonstrations the questions at issue should be settled by arbitration or by mutual concessions or agreements in the interest of all parties concerned. It is to be hoped that this and similar strikes will be settled by wisdom and justice. In these days of cold selfishness and material economy, it is expecting too much to look for the Christly spirit in the adjustment of industrial and other difficulties. But it would be salutary. And eventually the world will come to it. The apostle refers to it:

Put on therefore, as the elect of God, holy and beloved, bowels of mercies, kindness, humbleness of mind, meekness, long suffering; forbearing one another, and forgiving one another, if any man have a quarrel against any: even as Christ forgave you, so also do ye. (Col. 3: 12, 13.)

Great Crowds Watching the Marching Strikers as They Paraded on January 13

A Family's Phenomenal Longevity

IT IS said that the Benedict family holds the record for longevity in modern times. Three hundred years ago Thomas Benedict came to this country, and the average of each of his 170 descendants has been 83 years. One died at the age of 100 years. Nine died between the ages of 95 and 100 years. Fifteen died between the ages of 90 and 95. Twenty-six were between 85 and 90 when they died. Forty-two lived to be between 80 and 85 years old. Seventy-seven died between the ages of 75 and 80 years. Sixty-two years ago the present head of the family, Commodore Elias Cornelius Benedict, the poor son of a poor New England minister, came down to New York City and became a banker. Commodore Benedict, who is soon to celebrate his seventy-ninth birthday, says that contentment and freedom from strife and cares that are a tax on vitality are the secret of the phenomenal longevity of his family. He says: "I have worked hard, but have played whenever I could find opportunity. If it had not been for those periods of play I would have been dead long ago. I attend to business now because I cannot get away from it. I get every bit of enjoyment out of life that is possible, and I realize now that I could have got a great deal more had I not been bent on making money. Now that I have it, what good is it to me? I have done my children a great injustice to bring them up in luxury. The parent who accumulates a fortune and dangles it before his children commits a crime. Extreme poverty is truly a priceless inheritance. I suppose there are exceptions, but all the men I recall who have become great in the fields of literature, art or statecraft have been born in poverty. The only great man is the one who helps his fellow man by adding to the general store of the world's happiness." That play is as necessary as work in the divine economy for the health of the body and mind and soul as well is a lesson that Americans should seriously consider. The swift pace of American life kills; kills many of the women at forty and the men at forty-five, whose clock of life is wound up by nature to run for threescore years and ten. Commodore Benedict has on his yacht alone made rest and pleasure trips amounting to 225,000 miles, a distance almost ten times the circumference of the globe. It was on that yacht that Grover Cleveland had some of his happiest hours of recreation in fishing. There was hereditary longevity in the Benedict family. There was long life in the brain cells, the blood current, and the muscular tissues. Many beautiful families with contentment and a playful spirit have faded early with diseases from hereditary tendencies. Many families naturally strong have died prematurely for want of systematic rest and recreation and a contented spirit. The moral element as a factor in longevity is not to be overlooked. It was a good start for a long life to be born in a parsonage with virtue and poverty as friendly instrumentalities. This relation between a contented and playful spirit and physical health is thus described by the wise man:

A merry heart doeth good like a medicine; but a broken spirit drieth the bones. (Prov. 17: 22.)

Chinese Law Revolutionizes Dress

THE style of clothing worn for centuries by men and women in China has been changed by the authority of the new republic. Women will have to abandon their trousers for the Occidental skirt, and men their comfortable loose clothes for the business and conventional evening clothes of the European. The derby and silk hat are required for the men. They are allowed high calf-skin and low tan shoes, while the women are limited to high shoes. Besides shoes, only three articles of dress are prescribed for women. One, a loose-fitting garment on the lines of a kimono, is for house wear, and a conventional plaited skirt and shirtwaist for other occasions. The people of China copied our constitution for their republic; they are now adopting our dress as their model. If the Christian nations will act becomingly, China will adopt their Christ and his religion as her own, and be clothed in the garment of salvation of which the prophet speaks:

For he hath clothed me with the garments of salvation, he hath covered me with the robe of righteousness, as a bridegroom decketh himself with ornaments, and as a bride adorneth herself with her jewels. (Isa. 61: 10.)

Preventive Medicine World's Hope

PRESIDENT EMERITUS ELIOT in a public lecture to the Harvard Medical School the other day claimed that preventive medicine would eventually do away with poverty and misery, remedy industrial disputes and contribute to the cause of international peace. The ablest physicians of today magnify the preventive agencies, and the successful ones of the future will do the same. There is some relation between health and earthly success and happiness. But we do not share Dr. Eliot's idea that material medicine will cure poverty, or industrial differences, or national contests. A moral and spiritual remedy is necessary for maladies seated so deeply within. Justice and Christ's love are the preventive medicines that will cure the great ills under which the race groans and weeps. The prophet recognizes this truth in his question:

Is there no balm in Gilead; is there no physician there? Why then is not the health of the daughter of my people recovered? (Jer. 8: 22.)

A Loyal Church

LAST summer Rev. Dr. Ross McClements, pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Asbury Park, New Jersey, was drawn under a moving train and suffered the amputation of both legs and one arm. The other Sunday he occupied his pulpit the first time since the accident. He sat during the service though he has artificial limbs. His subject in the morning was "Marvelous confidence in God," and at night his theme was "God best served by serving man." Dr. McClements at the time of his injury tendered his resignation but his people would not accept it. This beautiful treatment of him is an example worthy of imitation. As an illustration of the mastery of mind over body, of the triumph of grace over misfortune, he said in his sermon: "This is the happiest day of my life." The text for his sermon might have been:

For our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory. (II. Cor. 4: 17.)

Rare Flower, Great Price

A SINGLE plant raised in America brought $10,000 in England. The plant is an orchid and bears a pure white flower instead of the variegated colors like the rest of the family to which it belongs. It was by an accident that it was not sold for a dollar. It was left over from a stock of plants as not desirable by purchasers, and the next spring the pure white blossoms surprised the florist and put the extremely high price upon the plant. God has unity in his handiwork. He makes the membes of families alike, and yet he has also variety and sometimes seeming contradictions that surprise and puzzle the naturalist. Flowers are the most beautiful expressions of the divine mind; they are the most exquisite materialization of his love. A white flower is the symbol of purity. Ten thousand dollars seems much for one flower, but it does not measure the value of the beauty and love of the pure white flower, or the mind and heart that made them for us. Christ thus expresses his estimate of the value of a flower:

Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin; and yet I say unto you, that even Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these. (Matt. 6:28,29.)

GOD'S COVENANT IN COLORS

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

THE flag of truce, which is pure white, is the sign of a cessation of hostilities for a longer or shorter time when a war is in progress. Under such a flag, combatants may send their representatives into each other's camps, and be sure that no harm will be done them. Frequently a permanent peace is thus arranged. The rainbow is the flag of truce which God has placed in the sky overhead, a token of everlasting peace. God himself said of it to Noah after the days of the flood were past, "I do set my bow in the cloud, and it shall be for a token of a covenant between me and the earth. . . . I will remember my covenant, which is between me and you and every living creature of all flesh, and the waters shall no more become a flood to destroy all flesh" (Gen. 9: 13, 15). God's flag of truce was made of the light, and light is white. But light is composed of seven beautiful colors. The alchemy of the rainbow reveals this. In giving this lesson to our Sunday school classes, we should in some fashion reproduce a rainbow. It can be done by holding a prism in the sunshine. Immediately a patch of color will be seen upon the wall, arranged as in the rainbow—red, orange, yellow, green, blue, indigo and violet. In every Sunday school a rainbow should be drawn in color on the blackboard or on the teacher's slate or pad. It will be more impressive if it is drawn while the scholars are looking on. There should be printed on it the word Covenant.

It is not to be supposed that Noah for the first time in his life saw the rainbow, when God said to him, "This is the token of the covenant," etc. From the beginning sun and rain had produced rainbows, but from the time of Noah the rainbow had a new significance. It was made the visible sign that man had been given a new chance to prove his birthright as one created in the image of God. Those who had perished in the flood had sold their birthright for the wages of sin. Noah and his family by their sacrifice to God after coming out of the ark expressed their desire to be known as the children of God, and God took them at their word and entered with them into an everlasting covenant of fellowship.

We are reminded of another covenant sign, which God gave in after years to his chosen people through Moses: the ribband of blue, which they were to put upon the fringes of the tallith, the prayer robe, "that ye may look upon it, and remember all the commandments of the Lord, and do them" (Num. 15: 38, 39). How wonderful was the significance of color in the religious life of those days long ago! The tabernacle had its hangings of blue, purple and scarlet as well as its vessels of yellow gold to teach the beauty and the glory of serving God. The high priest was arrayed in garments of white, embroidered with blue, purple and scarlet. He thus epitomized sin and redemption, and the breastplate of twelve precious stones which was fastened to his shoulders by chains of gold and two precious stones was to be a constant reminder of the great host of Israel for whom he pleaded with God daily for mercy and forgiveness. The white turban-like cap with its engraving of gold, "Holiness to the Lord," which he wore upon his forehead, was to be to him a reminder that he must himself be pure. As we look up to the tabernacle of God, the heavens, and see the red in the rainbow, we should be reminded of our scarlet sins, and the blood which Jesus Christ shed for us that we might be forgiven. As we look at the orange and yellow gold in the rainbow, let us think of the heavenly city, whose streets are paved with gold, and the glorious mansions that Jesus is preparing for us. Let us look at the green in the rainbow and think of the emerald hue that surrounds the throne of God (Rev. 4: 3). Let us, as we look at the deep, dark blue, think of the sapphire glory of the atmosphere of heaven, as we see it in the sky overhead. Let us look at the tender purple in the rainbow and think how great is our privilege that we are made "joint heirs with Christ" (Rom. 8: 17). What a leap from being a lost sinner to be placed among the joint heirs of Christ!

After God had shown Noah the rainbow as a sign of his covenant, we should naturally believe that he went forth, and to the end of his life, of which about three hundred years remained, did what he could to help his descendants to live as the chosen people of God. But, alas! he did not live a perf life, for we are told that "Noah began to be an h bandman and he planted a vineyard, and he dra of the wine and was drunken" (Gen. 9: 20). W man going to fail God a second time? Did God pent again that he had made man? No, C spared the drunkard and kept the bow as a token the cloud. Two of the sons of Noah, Shem a Japheth, had enough goodness in their hearts to ashamed of their father, so they covered him wi a garment while he lay in stupor. And ever sir then, good men have been trying to help drunkar out of the pit into which they have fallen.

The next time we see a rainbow, let us look up it and imagine that we s stamped upon it, coverii its entire length and breadt the letters spelling COVI NANT. But before rai bow time comes again, l us learn seven verses connect with the seven co ors.

1. "Trust in the Lor and do good; so shalt tho dwell in the land, and ver ily thou shalt be fed." P. 37: 3. It is the promise o God's care over us.

2. "He will not suffer th foot to be moved; he tha keepeth thee will not slum ber." Ps. 121: 3. It is th protection of God by day and by night.

3. "In all thy ways ac knowledge him, and h shall direct thy paths." Prov. 3: 6. It is the promise of guidance.

4. "Though your sins be as scarlet they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool." Isa. 1: 18. It is the promise of redemption from sin of which we cannot rid ourselves.

5. "God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able." I. Cor. 10: 13. It is the promise of help when pursued by Satan.

6. "Ask, and it shall be given you; seek and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you." Matt. 7: 7. It is the promise that he will give us the desires of our hearts.

7. "In my Father's house are many mansions. . . . I go to prepare a place for you." John 14: 2. It is the promise of eternal joy and comfort.

Some teachers may think well of calling these "rainbow verses," and giving to the children strips of different colored paper with the name of the book, chapter and verse upon each, leaving it for them to find the passages, copy them, and return the slips on the following Sunday.

Mythology is largely made up by idealizing nature. The Hindus speak of the rainbow as the war bow hung up in the heavens after victory over the demons. Was it not at the time of the flood a sign of victory over evil? In Grecian mythology it is the arch which Zeus stretches from one end of heaven to the other as a warning of war. In the mythology of Iceland, the rainbow was spoken of as a bridge which the gods built to join heaven and earth. At the time of the flood God reunited himself with mankind by taking the rainbow as a seal.

OUR SUNDAY SCHOOL SUPERINTENDENTS' ROUND TABLE

—ONE OF THE LATEST contributors to the Round Table is Mr. C. L. Noble, of Fallon, Nev., who is superintendent of the Methodist Sunday school of that town. He reports that he finds it very hard to get teachers, especially hard to get men to teach boys, or anybody else. The majority of the church officers, as well as other men, turn this duty over to the women and young folks, and do not even attend the Bible classes, saying by action if not in words, that the Sunday school is no place for men. Another obstacle to his work is "lack of interest on the part of parents."

NOW THERE TWO difficulties are the two greatest difficulties of superintendents generally, and we know no way to cure them except by persistent and patient educational work by the pastor, who in his sermons and in his calls alike should show that the religious training of the young is the very first duty and highest privilege of parents and church officers. Many pastors and superintendents seem to think that they must accept as fixed and final the new situation, only one generation old, that the entire religious training of the young—formerly shared by Sunday school teachers as junior partners with parents and pastors and public school teachers—shall all be crowded into thirty minutes a week of Sunday school teaching, without any help from fathers even in those thirty minutes, and no help even from the preaching service, which children in these days are not expected to attend.

—AS TO GETTING new teachers, one of the most successful superintendents says that the way to do it is to ask one and another to teach two or three Sundays, and then make the work so interesting they will not be willing to give it up. If the person proves unfitted for the work this plan gives easy deliverance. Many would consent to teach for a brief term who would not accept an indefinite appointment. That church officers, even spiritual officers, so seldom teach in Sunday school, the very best opportunity that is open to them, is probably not wholly their fault. When such men are ordained, and at times of revival, the supreme duty and privilege of teaching should be pressed on their attention. An elder or a deacon who does nothing but take the collection or usher people to seats on the Lord's Day does not truly keep the Sabbath, and certainly does not "magnify his office"—he minifies it.

—AS TO ENLISTING parents in the religious instruction of their own children, let the pastor arrange for at least one reception a year to be given by grateful parents to the teachers, who, without earthly reward, are helping to train their children to honor God and serve their fellows. Most people lack initiative, and the pastor must think out ways and means not only for the success of his church and parish work, but he must give to the parents the benefit and inspiration of his special training so that they may both realize and conscientiously meet their obligation to their children.

—WE NOTE that more of the Sunday school superintendents and pastors and teachers will bring their victories and defeats to this council table, which affords an opportunity to help and be helped in the greatest of all work, the molding of the character of childhood and youth—of manhood, too, for men are joining Sunday schools in these days in greater numbers than anybody else. DAILY MEDITATION

BY REV. J. H. JOWETT, D. D.

SUNDAY, February 2. II. Peter 3: 1-13. Amid all the dissolutions of time nothing can destroy the promise of our God. The treasury of grace is a bank that never breaks. It is exposed to no ill chances. Moth and rust cannot corrupt, neither can any thief break through and steal. And we have access into this treasury every hour of day and night. And the wonder is this, that with our changing need the treasury reveals a corresponding wealth. It can meet every demand of youth and age. We are never confronted with blank incompetency. We have a "sure promise" for "every time of need."

And yet, with a world full of gracious promises, we crawl about in spiritual poverty and complaint. There stands the treasury, and our heart's need is just across the counter, and we will not ask for it! "Ask, and it shall be given you." End the doubt in the handled gift. Gain assurance in the received bounty. "O taste and see how gracious the Lord is." The blessing is waiting which will change the sigh of the spirit into song! Thou shalt put off the rags of the beggar, and thou shalt become clothed in "the garments of salvation."

MONDAY, February 3. Genesis 8: 6-16. It is beautiful that the tokens of the abating waters were given in the dove and the olive leaf. And our God is always waiting to give us the same gracious signs in our own life. Whatever our life has been, however passionate and destructive, however disloyal and rebellious, we may receive from a pardoning God the holy tokens of the olive leaf and the dove. What is the significance of the work of the Lord Jesus, his life and his death, but the dove and the olive leaf—"peace on earth, good will toward men"? And the olive leaf is offered to everybody. The merciful God would be at peace with all. "Whosoever will!"

But the olive leaf must not be taken by the hand which grasps a traitor's sword. The sword must be laid aside. The purpose of our heart must be for peace. That is to say, the white dove must find a nest in our souls. There must be sincere penitence, and pure aspiration, and the humility which gives power to both. And so may every treacherous knight be received again at the Lord's table, and welcomed into intimate communion with the King. Simon Peter denied his Lord with curse and swearing. Afterward he received the olive leaf, and there came to him the white dove of the Holy Spirit.

TUESDAY, February 4. Genesis 8: 20 to 9: 7. When the floods of waters had abated Noah built an altar, and offered burnt offerings unto the Lord. And I read in a marginal rendering, "And the Lord smelled a savor of rest." It is a word of beautiful suggestiveness. Behind the smoke of the material altar the good Lord saw the altar of the soul, and he perceived the savor of a restful and thankful spirit. The material cloud counted for nothing, but the savor of restful praise was a delight unto the Lord. The incense that fills the material temple may never rise beyond its roof; but the incense of contented gratitude fills heaven with its fragrance.

I am therefore not surprised to read, "And God blessed Noah." Praise always makes room for bounty. There is nothing more expansive than thankfulness: it enlarges the heart and multiplies its capacity for the things of God. And therefore praise should always be the pioneer of prayer. Praise prepares the soul to receive the things for which we pray. Without praise the prayerful spirit cannot entertain the Lord. There is "no room for him in the inn."

WEDNESDAY, February 5. Genesis 9: 8-17. The bow in the cloud! And that bow is the token that every dark visitation is accompanied by his mercy and grace. God's clouds are never vagrant, wandering lawlessly here and there, ladened with misfortunes for the children of men. The apparently drifting clouds are steered by the hand of grace, and they are the vehicles of eternal love. God's clouds are "big with mercy, and shall break with blessings on our head." Every cloud is an agent of the covenant which shall never be broken. Even with the severest discipline of God's sovereign will there is "a rainbow round about the throne."

I must therefore pray that I may remember the covenant "in the dark and cloudy day." The eye of faith can see the rainbow in the midst of the fiercest storm. God's love runs through all his decrees like the red strand that runs through the authorized Alpine rope. Cut the rope anywhere and we shall find the scarlet thread. Cut God's severity anywhere and we shall find the red line of eternal and sacrificial love. "Love never faileth." "I have loved thee with an everlasting love." "Having loved his own he loved them unto the end."

THURSDAY, February 6. Psalm 40: 1-8. There is no work so exacting as that of waiting. Waiting for work is more wearying than the work itself. Waiting for battle is more trying to the nerves than actual fighting. There is inspiration in "doing," but we need a finer inspiration to remain nobly passive and still. It is comparatively easy to be "on the move," but to wait until "our hour is come" is often a tremendous task.

And therefore it is that the Scriptures so commend the strong virtue of noble waiting. They always associate it with rare and delicate rewards. In this very Psalm the waiting soul finds "a new song." The good Lord refined the chords of the waiting soul, and it discovered new powers of joy, and therefore new heights and depths of song. And this is pre-eminently the inheritance of the waiting soul. It is disciplined and chastened in its patience, and in its apparent inaction it is growing in the likeness of the Lord. In patient waiting we may not make a noise, but we make regal character. We may miss fame, but we become truly great. We may never have to take the sword, but we shall win the day by quiet waiting. "Rest in the Lord and wait patiently for him."

FRIDAY, February 7. Leviticus 26: 40-45. "When they be in the land of their enemies I will not cast them away." The divine love will not give up its quest. Our Lord follows us into our evil servitude and loves us in the very midst of our rebellion. It is one of the infinite mercies of God that it is so difficult to drive him away from our souls! When we turn him out of our

I'm glad of some things I haven't said yet. I don't know but I'm 'most glad I was hurt."

"Pollyanna!"

Pollyanna laughed again softly. She turned luminous eyes on her aunt.

"Well, you see, since I have been hurt, you've called me 'dear' lots of times—and you didn't before. I love to be called 'dear'—by folks that belong to you, I mean. Some of the Ladies' Aiders did call me that; and of course that was pretty nice, but not so nice as if they had belonged to me, like you do. Oh, Aunt Polly, I'm so glad you belong to me!"

Aunt Polly did not answer. Her hand was at her throat again. Her eyes were full of tears. She had turned and was hurrying from the room through the door by which the nurse had just entered.

It was that afternoon that Nancy ran out to Old Tom, who was cleaning harnesses in the barn. Her eyes were wild.

"Mr. Tom, Mr. Tom, guess what's happened," she panted. "Who do you s'pose is in the parlor now with the mistress? Who, I say?"

Old Tom shook his head.

"There's no tellin'," he declared.

"Yes, there is. I'm tellin'. It's—John Pendleton!"

"Sho, now! You're jokin', girl!"

"Not much I am—an' me lettin' him in myself—crutches an' all!

"Well, why not?" demanded the old man, a little aggressively.

Nancy gave him a scornful glance.

"As if you didn't know better'n me!" she derided.

"Eh?"

"Oh, you needn't be so innercent," she retorted with mock indignation. "'Twas you that was tellin' me Miss Polly had a lover in the first place; wan't it? Well, one day I heard somethin' that made me think him an' Miss Polly was lovers."

"Mr. Pendleton!" Old Tom straightened up.

"Yes. Oh, I know now he wan't. It was that blessed child's mother he was in love with—but never mind that part," she added hastily. "I've found out that him an' Miss Polly hain't been friends for years, an' that she's been hatin' him like pizen owin' ter the silly gossip that coupled their names tergether when she was eighteen or twenty."

"Yes, I remember," nodded Old Tom. "It was three or four years after Miss Jennie give him the mitten and went off with the other chap. Miss Polly knew about it, of course, and was sorry for him. So she tried ter be nice to him. Maybe she overdid it a little—she hated that minister chap so, who had took off her sister. At any rate, somebody begun ter make trouble. They said she was 'runnin after him'; and of course no gal of spirit could stand that. Then about that time come her own lover an' the trouble with him. After that she shut up like an oyster an' wouldn't have nothin' ter do with nobody fur a spell. Her heart jest seemed ter turn bitter at the core."

"Yes, I know. I've heard about that now," replied Nancy; "an' that's why you could 'a' knocked me down with a feather when I see him at the door—him, what she hain't spoke to for years! But I let him in an' went an' told her."

"What did she say?" Old Tom held his breath suspended.

"Nothin'—at first; then she speaks up quiet like: 'Tell Mr. Pendleton I will be down at once.' An' I come an' told him. Then I come out here an' told you," finished Nancy, casting another backward glance toward the house.

"Humph!" grunted Old Tom; and fell to work again.

In the ceremonious "parlor" of the Harrington homestead, Mr. John Pendleton did not have to wait long before a swift step warned him of Miss Polly's coming. As he attempted to rise, she made a gesture of remonstrance. She did not offer her hand, however, and her face was coldly reserved.

"I called to ask for—Pollyanna," he began at once, a little brusquely.

"Thank you. She is about the same," said Miss Polly.

"And that is—won't you tell me how she is?" His voice was not quite steady this time.

A quick spasm of pain crossed the woman's face.

"I can't. I wish I could."

"You mean—you do not know?"

"Yes."

"But—the doctor?"

"Dr. Warren himself seems—at sea. He is in correspondence now with a New York specialist. They intimacy he stands at the door and knocks. Sometimes he continues knocking for a whole lifetime and never gains admission. We hear him, and we pay no heed, but he goes on knocking. "Love hopeth all things," and therefore "endureth all things."

Let us give ourselves time to think. It is our thoughtlessness that keeps the holy Lord at the door. If we would only think our better feelings would awake from their deep sleep, and our affections would respond and sing to the Lover's call. And with affections truly awake every room in our soul will be filled with light and song. For affection will lift the latch, and the waiting Lover will come in, and with his incoming shall come new mornings and the sense of infinite freedom.

SATURDAY, February 8. Jeremiah 31: 31-34. The progress of the spiritual life is always in the direction of the "inward parts." The thinnest of all religions is a skin religion, a mere cosmetic, a sort of rouge decorating sickliness and death. True religion has its throne in the secret place. It uses no cosmetics, it purifies and enriches the blood. It is always deepening and strengthening its sovereignty, claiming all the springs and fountains of the soul.

It is in "the inward parts" that our God would write his law. Nay, the Gospel tells us more than this. Our God would not merely make the "secret place" a throne-chamber whence he issues his decrees. He would make it a festive chamber, and break bread with us in intimate communion. "I will come in and sup with him and he with me." That is the real grace of the new covenant. It is a sacrament: it is the sacred intercourse of the common meal. Our Lord seeks our "living room," the innermost privacy of the soul, and there, amid all our secret things, he would stamp his image and likeness in friendly and loving communion.

Love! Miss Polly remembered sudnly why she had taken this child in e first place—and with the recollec-n came the remembrance of Polly-na's own words uttered that very rning: "I love to be called 'dear' by lks that belong to you!" And it as this love-hungry little girl that d been offered the stored-up affecn of twenty-five years—and she as old enough to be tempted by love!
ith a sinking heart Miss Polly real-ed that. With a sinking heart, too, e realized something else: the eariness of her own future now—ithout Pollyanna.
"Well?" she said. And the man, cognizing the self-control that virated through the harshness of the ne, smiled sadly.
"She would not come," he answered.
"Why?"
"She would not leave you. She id you had been so good to her.
he wanted to stay with you—and she aid she thought you wanted her to tay," he finished, as he pulled him-elf to his feet.
He did not look toward Miss Polly.
e turned his face resolutely toward he door. But instantly he heard a wift step at his side, and found a haking hand thrust toward him.
"When the specialist comes, and I now anything—definite about Polly-nna, I will let you hear from me," said a trembling voice. "Good-by—and thank you for coming. Pollyanna will be—pleased."

CHAPTER XXII

A Waiting Game

ON THE day after John Pendleton's call at the Harrington homestead, Miss Polly set herself to the task of preparing Pollyanna for the visit of the specialist.

"Pollyanna, my dear," she began gently, "we have decided that we want another doctor besides Dr. Warren to see you. Another one might tell us something new to do to—to help you get well faster, you know."

A joyous light came to Pollyanna's face.

"Dr. Chilton! Oh, Aunt Polly, I'd so love to have Dr. Chilton!"

Aunt Polly's face turned white, then red, then back to white again.

"Oh, no, dear! It wasn't Dr. Chilton at all that I meant. It is a new doctor—a very famous doctor from New York, who—who knows a great deal about—about hurts like yours."

Pollyanna's face fell.

"But it was Dr. Chilton who doctored Mr. Pendleton's broken leg, Aunt Polly. If—if you don't mind very much, I would like to have Dr. Chilton—truly I would!"

A distressed red swept across Miss Polly's face. For a moment she did not speak at all; then she said gently—though yet with a touch of her old stern decisiveness:

"But I do mind, Pollyanna. I would do anything—almost anything for you, my dear; but I— For reasons which I do not care to speak of now, I don't wish Dr. Chilton called in on—on this case. And believe me, dear, he can not know so much about—about your trouble, as this great doctor does, who will come from New York to-morrow."

Pollyanna still looked unconvinced.

"But, Aunt Polly, if you loved Dr. Chilton—"

"What, Pollyanna?" Aunt Polly's voice was very sharp now. Her cheeks were very red, too.

"I say, if you loved Dr. Chilton, and didn't love the other one," sighed Pollyanna, "seems to me that would make some difference in the good he would do; and I love Dr. Chilton."

The nurse entered the room at that moment, and Miss Polly rose to her feet abruptly.

"I am very sorry, Pollyanna," she said, a little stiffly; "but I'm afraid you'll have to let me be the judge—this time. Besides, it's already arranged. The New York doctor is coming to-morrow."

As it happened, however, the New York doctor did not come "to-morrow." At the last moment a telegram told of an unavoidable delay owing to the sudden illness of the specialist himself. This led Pollyanna into a renewed pleading for the substitution of Dr. Chilton.

But as before, Aunt Polly shook her head and said, "No, dear—anything but that."

100,000 Americans are using daily a new book which tells the whole story of human knowledge in a new way, in the light of the most recent research and in readable and interesting language. It is the most successful book of our time, and the most useful. Every university library, more than 2,000 public libraries, all of the great newspapers, hundreds of banks, manufacturing companies, thousands of business men, the foremost scholars, authors, lawyers, doctors, clergymen, engineers have bought it. The book reviewers have referred to it in the most flattering terms, and it is being sold in every country of the world where the English language is spoken.

This Book is the new 1910-11 Edition of the

Encyclopaedia Britannica

28 Volumes and Index—Published by the Press of the University of Cambridge, England.

The India Paper Set, each volume but one inch thick, bound in full Sheepskin. The Index Volume (on ordinary paper) is seen on top.

The New Edition of this celebrated work displaces and supersedes all previous editions and all "reprints." It contains 40,000 articles and 44,000,000 words of text—the largest body of information ever printed in one work, and it is the only encyclopedia which is up to date.

As no mere pamphlet is adequate to describe this wonderful new work, we have had to prepare a book about it of 250,000 words, containing many illustrations and exemplifying the wonderful saving in bulk and increased convenience brought about by the use of thin but opaque India paper. It costs us over 50 cents a copy to print and mail.

You should examine this elaborate prospectus because it describes the most notable literary undertaking of the age, upon which $1,500,000 was expended before a single copy was printed.

Sign the attached inquiry form, and we shall be pleased to send you by mail our 250,000-word "Book About a Book," together with full particulars of prices, payments, bindings, bookcases, etc.

Let Sanatogen give you new strength and vitality

A NERVE crisis. How many thousands of men and women have come to a sudden realization that their nerves have broken down as a result of the strain of daily effort, illness or worry.

And when you reach this stage—when you lack ambition and snap, when your digestion is impaired, when your sleep is broken—look to your nerves.

Your nerves are your greatest health asset. When they are right and full of vigor, they respond freely to almost any demand upon them. But when they are not right—when they are tired and exhausted—they tell you in a way you cannot mistake that they are hungry and need help.

Many thousands of physicians have found that in just such crises as these Sanatogen is most valuable. It is a combination of the elements nerves need—and must have—purest protein and organic phosphorus.

This combination feeds the nerves with their own natural food—in a form that is easily and readily digested. There is no tax on the stomach—no artificial stimulation to urge on the tired, hungry nerves, only to leave them more fagged than ever. Every particle of Sanatogen is eagerly taken up by the hungry cells and converted into energy and health.

16,000 physicians have attested their confidence in Sanatogen—over their signatures—as the ideal food and tonic for tired, exhausted nerves. And you may do well to consider this mass of evidence when considering what your nerves need.

Prof. Thomas B. Stillman, M.S., Ph.D.

The well-known research chemist of Steven's Institute, writes: "The Chemical union of the constituents of Sanatogen is a true one, representative of the highest skill in the formation of a product certaining phosphorus in the organic phosphate condition, and so combined that digestion and assimilation of Sanatogen are rendered complete with greatest ease."

Prof. C. A. Ewald, of Berlin University, Doctor honoris causa University of Maryland, states in his contribution on "Typhus abdominalis.

"I can say that I have used Sanatogen in a great number of cases (that is, in those disturbances of metabolism which were mainly of a nervous or neurasthenic origin) and have obtained excellent results."

Charles D. Sigsbee,

Rear Admiral, U. S. Navy, writes:

After a thorough trial of Sanatogen, I am convinced of its merit as a food and tonic. Its beneficial effects are beyond doubt."

Lady Henry Somerset,

the prominent social reform advocate, writes:

"Sanatogen undoubtedly restores sleep, invigorates the nerves and braces the patient to health. I have watched its effect on people whose nervous systems have been entirely undermined, and I have proved Sanatogen to be most valuable."

John Burroughs,

The distinguished naturalist and author, writes:

"I am sure I have been greatly benefited by Sanatogen. My sleep is fifty per cent. better than it was one year ago, and my mind and strength are much improved."

THE VOICE OF THE NATION ON ROME

Iowa Presbyterians on Roman Aggression

THE Presbytery of Des Moines, Synod of Iowa, of the Presbyterian Church of the United States of America, in session at Hartford, Iowa, on September 11, 1912, adopted resolutions as follows: "We hereby record our earnest devotion to the principles upon which our government is founded, viz.: the separation of church and state, the right of private judgment in matters of purely religious faith and practice, the freedom of the press, free public schools and free churches, and we earnestly protest against the diversion of public funds to schools or other institutions under ecclesiastical control, the wearing by teachers in government and public schools of uniforms as insignia of their ecclesiastical affiliations, and the celebration of papal military mass on the White House grounds in Washington, D. C.

"We call upon our people and all loyal Americans to note the aggressions in recent years of the Roman Catholic hierarchy to gain control of the national government, and the announced determination of men of high rank in that church to gain that end at any cost. We urge all to study this question in the light of Rome's claim of supreme control over individuals and nations, and in the light of the history of Europe during the Middle Ages, and the record of St. Bartholomew's Day, the night between August 24 and 25, 1572."

A Plea for Protestant Unity

I HAVE been reading with considerable interest "The Nation's Voice on Rome," and am surprised that the solution of the danger is not stated, namely: Let the competition between the various denominations cease; in other words, get together. A writer in a late issue of Munsey's Magazine, speaking on the weakness of Protestantism, gave the result of his investigations in a number of States. Suffice to mention a representative case. In a community of twelve hundred there were fourteen churches for Protestants and one for Catholics. The Protestants averaged twenty-eight members; the Catholic Church had three hundred. This is a fair sample of what we find in many sections of the country. Is it any wonder that there are so many ministers who have never been properly trained or educated, or that so many receive starvation wages? Not that their congregations do not contribute liberally, but they simply cannot meet expenses because of their number. Last summer, here in Brooklyn, seven churches united for Sunday services, yet the attendance rarely exceeded 175, oftener less. Of ten churches within a short distance of each other, four are large enough to accommodate all who would attend at any time of the year. Again, when a new suburb is opened, every denomination at once enters, the result being that instead of calling a man of experience, who would have a fair chance of securing a large congregation, incapable men are hired, only to be dismissed in a few months or years, while the people are hounded to death to meet current expenses. Why not let the church that is the pioneer get the benefit, and another come in only when increased population warrants? This explains why so many churches have fairs and entertainments of every kind, often of a questionable character, to raise money.

Again, many churches are started as the result of a quarrel. We find congregations splitting up and erecting churches not to the glory of God but for spite. It is a well-known fact that one large church or congregation does more really aggressive work than a dozen weak ones, unless one considers the paying of a dozen ministers, sextons, organists and choirs more important; not to mention the expense of heating, lighting, repairing, etc., of a dozen buildings, where one would be sufficient. Compare these loose methods with the perfect system in the Catholic Church regarding the establishment, division and sustaining of its parishes, and one sees why under such conditions it is only a question of time when the Catholics will predominate in the United States. Business men get together to lessen competition and get better results; but the children of the world are wiser than the children of light. Why do not the big men of our various denominations who recognize these weaknesses, agitate persistently the question of correcting them? Is it because they love the liberty of their petty sects better than unity in furthering Christ's kingdom? U. S.

The Roman Church in Politics

POLITICAL Romanism, by Chattin Bradway, 52 Bliss Building, Washington, D. C., is a book of 350 pages with an appendix and a good index. It is a carefully prepared outline of the relations between the aggressive agents of the Roman Curia and American politicians and parties from the country's earliest days to the present time. The value of the book is greatly increased by the continuous supply of references for the numerous citations that reinforce the statements of the writer. Perhaps the last hundred pages will be regarded by many as the most interesting, but the whole book is of value to those who desire to know the facts bearing on the important subject treated. The price is 50 cents, paper; cloth, 75 cents.

THE Concordia Publishing House, St. Louis, Mo., has brought out several pamphlets dealing with the Roman question. Among them are Romanism and the Presidency, price, 25 cents for ten copies. The Logical and Historical Inaccuracies of the Hon. Bourke Cockran, price, 10 cents; Trial and Self-Conviction of Pope Leo XIII, price, 10 cents with, and five cents without, Latin quotations; and The Pope in Politics (price not stated). These booklets are written by Professors E. H. T. Dau and William Dallmann, men of acknowledged scholarship, well qualified for the work they have undertaken.

A Political and Educational Menace

Many forces are at work in our national life with which the church must contend. The Roman Catholic Church has adherents numbering fifteen millions. That church is a menace to our educational and political as well as our religious life.—From the Inter-Church, December 28, 1912.

HOUSEHOLD HINTS

Muffin tins are excellent molds for individual tarts and pies.

If eggs are cracked, they may nevertheless be boiled without fear of further cracking if a teaspoonful of salt is added to the water in which they are to be boiled.

Cut samples of all that goes into the piece-bag. Hold these together with a very large safety-pin, and fasten on the outside of the bag. This suggestion, if tried, will save both time and patience.

Before cleaning any garment, baste a circle around every soiled spot. When dipped into the cleaning fluid there will then be no difficulty in locating the very soiled places, which require more scrubbing than the rest of the garment.

Measure the top of your gas range, buy a piece of asbestos of the same size, then cut holes in the asbestos the size and shape of each stove burner. Use this shield when preparing a meal. Afterward, when it is removed, the stove will be free from the usual grease spots and spatterings, which necessitate frequent hard scourings.

Women who are using one of the "new cooking products" in order to escape the high price of butter say that they are not merely saving money but are delighted with their results. Their folks made no comment when they substituted the low-priced product for the higher, and the most critical have had nothing to say against the foods cooked with the manufactured article.

CHOOSING THE BOARDING-SCHOOL

THE selection of a boarding-school for a boy or girl involves a number of considerations. The age, temperament, characteristics, and aims are of the first importance, while the equipment and facilities of the school are of hardly less consequence. The change from the home atmosphere to that of a school may be beneficial, effective and often necessary, and yet there are times when possibly the choice of a school is made too soon.

Nevertheless, there are often excellent reasons why a boy or girl should be educated in a boarding-school, and when such is the case, great wisdom should be shown in selecting the right school. It is a common mistake for parents to leave this matter until vacation time. It is not only an injustice to a school to judge of its ability to fit a boy or girl for college life or for a manly or womanly career simply by a careful scrutiny of its buildings and equipment, but it is a lack of wisdom sometimes bordering on calamity to the student, for the influences surrounding a boy or girl while in close companionship with students and teachers living together for a larger part of the year, under the same roof, associated both day and night, have far more to do with the development of character and the molding of ambitions and habits than the very finest possible paraphernalia.

To visit a school during the summer months when no recitations are in progress, while no teachers or pupils are visible and while only buildings and surroundings can be seen, is much like purchasing an automobile simply from seeing the framework, without any knowledge as to the construction of its engine. Yet, this is the way schools are often selected. An exception might be made where a school is chosen because of the recommendation of some pupil who has formerly attended it, or where the prestige of past history fully warrants such a choice without a personal visit.

To make a wise choice, which shall mean for the boy or girl the exact fulfilment of requirements in scholarship that are now standard in America, and in order that each individual may develop along the lines of special peculiarities, too much pains cannot be taken to find out where these may be attained to the best advantage.

On a memorable occasion Rufus Choate and Daniel Webster were pitted against each other in a lawsuit involving the question of the construction of certain car wheels. For many hours Mr. Choate argued exhaustively on the technicalities and comparisons of materials used, until the jury were so mystified that it would have been impossible for them to render a fair verdict. When Mr. Webster took up his argument he requested that the car wheels be brought into the court-room and laid in front of the jury, and his only comment was "There they are, gentlemen, look at them."

There are in this country to-day a vast number of very finely conducted and well established private and boarding schools, and when the problem faces parents or guardians with necessity of selecting one of these schools, the making of a choice is perplexing. There are in most cases such a slight difference in the general management of the schools of the accepted standard and in the quality and high standing of the faculty, that a student would do well and be benefited by an attendance at almost any one of them.

In each case the pupil himself must be considered and it is because of this fact that the importance of a personal visit to boarding-schools, before making an enrolment, is emphasized.

There may be reasons why a boy or girl might make splendid advancement under the conditions and environments of one school, while in another this would be impossible. For instance, it is possible that a boy who is passionately fond of athletics, expert and popular, in a large school where the spirit of athletics is most prominent, would be tempted to give so much of his thought—even if he were not permitted to give the time—to this one department, that an otherwise brilliant mentality would be overshadowed and our country would perhaps be the loser as the result. Under different circumstances in a smaller school this same boy would find a taste for literature or mathematics awakened and stimulated, and instead of the athlete would appear the editor or engineer.

Many a girl whose mind is entirely given up to the fashions and frivolities of the day, who in a large and fashionable boarding-school would only continue the stimulation of such tendencies, in some smaller or simpler boarding-school would receive the inspiration necessary to awaken a sense of true womanhood and send her back to her home an active and influential member of society.

Or, on the other hand, the reverse might often be true, and a boy or girl whose natural or apparent tendency was one of reticence and inactivity would be greatly stimulated and inspired by the association with large numbers who are already conversant with the ways of the world.

Often it is wise for a parent to take the son or daughter direct to the school which seems most appropriate, and there in consultation with the principal determine whether or not that school is the one to select. The honest principal will invariably tell the parent or guardian whether the school can accomplish what is most desirable under the conditions.

Very frequently the parent is the last person in the world to be able to judge of the qualities and natural tendency of his own child; while on the other hand principals of boarding-schools intuitively recognize latent talents and ability, and under the inspiring influence of a boarding-school life, away from indulgent influences in the home, bring to the surface those inherent qualities which really are to be found in almost every normal boy or girl.

There is no question as to the moral aims of all good boarding-schools. All schools of a desirable character are carried on under wholesome religious influences. In fact, many a boy or young man has been won to a robust Christian life by the example of a stalwart teacher who could make a daring tackle on the football field or give him a fast ten minutes with the boxing gloves, and an hour later lead the Y. M. C. A. service with deep spirituality.

AMONG THE WORKERS

EVANGELIST H. D. SHELTON, of Auburn, N. Y., reports a successful meeting at Dalton, Mass., in which he was assisted by his co-workers, Mr. and Mrs. Harry M. Rose, of Connersville, Ind. The services were largely attended, and many were converted.

THE THIRTY-EIGHTH INTERNATIONAL Convention of the Young Men's Christian Associations of the United States and Canada, which was announced to take place at Los Angeles, Calif., May 8-12, has been changed to Cincinnati, Ohio, May 15-18.

A REMARKABLE SCENE occurred recently in Lamar, Mich., when, during a revival campaign conducted by Evangelist Dan A. Shannon, the proprietor of a pool-room was converted and consented to have the outfit of his resort broken to pieces. Many others were converted during the meetings.

THE UNITED CHRISTIAN WORKERS of America (Incorporated), with headquarters at 728 East Two Hundred and Twenty-second Street, New York, reports that the society has conducted open-air conventions, supplied speakers and music for evangelistic work, conducted meetings in missions, churches and from Gospel cars, carried on rescue work in Chinatown, visited residences, hospitals, and other institutions, distributed clothing, food, etc., to the poor, and promoted other religious and charitable activities. The Rev. and Mrs. W. H. Collinson are the leaders of the movement.

Aunt Celia at the Wedding

A Society Jingle Up to Date

BY EUGENE THWING

'TWAS the night of the wedding, and all through the house every creature was stirring, yes, even the mouse; for Dorothy Willing and Edward Gladness were expecting the preacher their union to bless. The last preparations were hurrying on, for time was a-flying and soon would be gone; the lights, and the flowers, and fixings complete, the awning and carpet clear down to the street. Six tables of presents—a gorgeous array—gold, silver, and jewels, made a splendid display. Detectives stood watching the glittering wealth, to stop all intruders approaching by stealth.

The bride in her boudoir was fixing her hair; the groom in impatience was waiting somewhere; the liveried butlers stood pompously by, and a crowd on the sidewalk peeked in on the sly, when down from Fifth Avenue rattled and clattered a rickety wagon with mud all bespattered. 'Twas drawn by a scrawny old bundle of bones that threatened to tumble apart on the stones. An old negro mammy then rose to her feet and handed the reins to the boy on the seat. She smoothed out the wrinkles that rumpled her gown, and patted, and straightened, and pinned a bow down.

Then up sprang the burly and blustering cop, and cried, "Move on, Granny! Here's no place to stop." He grabbed at her horse just to lead it away; but granny was ready with something to say.

"Yo' jes' quit dat, mister, an' leave dat hawse 'lone! Can't stop hyah? Shucks, chile, doan' yo' talk in dat tone! Doan' yo' reckon I knows what I wants ter do, sah? Now, Tommy, till granny come back, yo' stay da." She sprang to the sidewalk and marched up the stoop, where liveried butlers stood round in a group. Their hostile attacks she indignantly parried. "I'se gwine ter see missy afore she gits married!"

Just then Mr. Willing (the father, I mean), who heard the commotion, appeared on the scene. "I declare, it's Aunt Celia! You're welcome!" he cried; and the old colored mammy expanded with pride. She'd lived with the family thirty long years, as faithful a servant as ever appears, till the Willings their family affection had shown, and built her a home on a farm all her own. From this little farm she had driven to town in best Sunday bonnet and gorgeous new gown. "I'se des came to de weddin'—yo's sure awful busy—an' I'se brung in de wagon a present for missy." Policemen, detectives, and butlers gave way; for the old colored mammy had carried the day. She was ushered upstairs to her own "missy's" room, and watched her get ready to welcome the groom.

When guests were assembled and bride was arrayed, Aunt Celia caught sight of the presents displayed; and then she remembered "de wagin" outside. In a tone of excitement, "De punkin!" she cried. A couple of servants were sent to the street, and found little Tommy still perched on his seat, with a barrel of apples, most beautiful red, and a pumpkin as big as a baby hogshead. They tussled and struggled and lugged them inside, where Celia presented them all to the bride. "Bigges' punkin in Jersey!" Aunt Celia exclaimed. "An' de apples de bes' on ma fahm," she explained.

The bride's costly presents of silver and gold, and cut glass, and jewels, and treasures untold made room for the gifts from the small Jersey farm, and detectives stood guarding them safe from all harm. A big golden punchbowl, with lordliest grace, to the barrel of apples surrendered its place; while diamonds, and silver, and ornaments made a frame for the great yellow pumpkin displayed. And none of the guests left the wedding that night without a last look at the curious sight of picturesque presents, the oddest array that a fashionable wedding has seen to this day.

ANSWERED PRAYERS

E THAT cometh to God must believe that he is, and that he is a rarder of them that diligently c him." A mother writes from risburg, Pa.: "Yes, I do believe in wered prayers. THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETINGS

NOTES ON THE CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR, EPWORTH LEAGUE AND BAPTIST YOUNG PEOPLE'S UNION TOPICS

The Zeal of the Christian*

WHAT is zeal? It is an intense feeling that works itself out in action; it is an irresistible desire to get something done. There are two kinds of zeal. There is in the first place the zeal that is full of extravagant joy, the zeal felt in doing precisely the thing you want to do at precisely the time you want to do it. People are sometimes apt to think that life is hard because so little of it is spent in doing the things that we really want to do. We hear much about drudgery. Drudgery is doing what you don't want to do. When hour after hour goes by, spent in doing certain things, when all the time you would rather be doing something else, that makes a day of drudgery.

Then there are the minutes, or hours, or days, spent in doing things in which we delight. There are minutes when we take a deep, contented breath and think: "Oh, I would rather be doing this than anything else in the world!" You can remember such moments, moments on the clear, hard ice on a bright, sharp winter day; minutes at the piano, or under the summer trees with a favorite book; minutes on the tennis court, or the cinder path, or the football field; minutes, maybe, in the laboratory, or in the classroom of a favorite teacher, or in the old college library, or perhaps in the kitchen, trying a new recipe, or in the machine shop, or bending over a drawing-board.

But there is another kind of zeal, not the zeal of delight in work or play, but the zeal of dreadful earnestness. Soldiers in battle, neighbors scouring the thickets for a lost child, a physician fighting for the life of some one whom he loves—there is actual zeal in the hearts of such toilers.

Now, one or the other of these two kinds of zeal ought to be in the heart of the ideal Christian all the time. In fact, it is probably true that both kinds can be in the heart at the same time. The soldier, fighting furiously, may feel the thrills of joy which come from love of country and from abandonment to a great motive. Jesus, just before the horrors of the darkness of his last hours, could talk to his disciples about his joy.

Have we either or both of these kinds of zeal in our work for Christ? Do we love him so deeply and so ardently that our really greatest delight is in doing his will, in trying to please him? Then do we care so tremendously for the sins and the dangers and sorrows of others that we are almost frantic in our efforts to help them? We must have "knowledge" with our zeal; we must have serenity with our passion. But we ought to care intensely, profoundly, desperately about the tasks the Master has put into our hands.

Do you say that zeal is chiefly for older Christians? Not at all. Think of the zeal of the children who strewed the palm branches before Him and shouted "Hosanna!" Think of the sweet pathos of the "Children's Crusade." Think of the young lives giving themselves to-day for Jesus and the unenlightened souls he loves in foreign lands. What are we doing for him?

Christian Principles†

THIS is practically the same subject as that studied by the Christian Endeavorers last week, and they are considering to-day the subject assigned for the B. Y. P. U. lesson last Sunday.

Notice the Christian principles emphasized in the Scripture lesson, John 14: 6-15. The first is the recognition of Jesus as the way, the truth and the life (verse 6). Are we upholding this principle by really accepting it and getting the joy and power there is in it for ourselves, and telling others about it? The way to holiness and happiness, the way to success and heaven, is—Jesus. The truth we crave, truth about the big spiritual problems and truth about the little or the big perplexities of daily life, is to be found in personal talks with Jesus; the divine, powerful, eternal life we long for is in Jesus.

Here is another Christian principle: "He that believeth on me, the works that I do shall he do also" (verse 12). The power of faith to enable us to live Christlike lives and to have Christlike victories. Are we upholding that principle? We cannot enter here into the mystery of the last part of that verse. "Greater works," perhaps because there are so many more of us. Only one Christ; millions of Christians—and every one promised the same power that he had! Is he not saying again sadly: "O ye of little faith!"

Verse 13 states the principle of prayer; verse 15 the principle of obedience. Are we fervent and victorious in prayer? Are we loyal in obedience?

It is a high call which is sounding in our ears, is it not—to uphold the principles of faith and life that the Son of God set forth!

Give the Black Man a Chance*

AMERICA owes a great deal to Africa—to Africa, the dark continent, and to Africa as represented in our home population. African brawn helped largely in the foundation of our national civilization and prosperity. America was the last Christian nation to remove the black man's chains. We have recently been celebrating the half-century anniversary of the great Lincoln's Emancipation Proclamation. But freeing the slave was only the beginning of our duty to him. The fulfilling of that duty has gone forward nobly since the war, but much remains to be done.

The Scripture passages are most appropriate. "Ye ought to support the weak"; "it is more blessed to give than to receive." (Acts 20: 35). We must find a way of sharing our mental strength, as we try to share our spiritual strength, with those who have less. "We then that are strong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak, and not to please ourselves" (Rom. 15: 1). Not to please ourselves! A great secret there—to find our real pleasure in planning for others, and trying to help them. "Let us love one another" (I. John 4: 7). Love will solve this problem as it will every other. If the Epworth League will bring itself really to care about the backward citizens of this other race, will pray and plan and give and work, it can help the Freedman's Aid Society to carry on with new haste and vigor and success its splendid task.

Save Christian Herald Covers

In a late issue of your paper a subscriber expressed regret that there was not some way to preserve the beautiful HERALD covers. Let me tell her how I am planning to save them from destruction, and enjoy them, for a few years at least. I cut the front covers from the magazine, and as they are not creased, lay them flat in a pile on a closet shelf, with a light weight on them—a book or a box. When enough have accumulated, they are to be arranged for a border to a chamber, the sides of the room to be papered with a plain paper of some harmonizing color. After I am through reading THE CHRISTIAN HERALD it is passed on to my friends to enjoy. M. B.

No-Rim-Cut Tires 10% Oversize

The Tale They Told

Here is a tale told by Goodyear tires to 250,000 users.

Told nearly two million times.

It sold last year 918,687 Goodyear tires. It has made them the largest-selling tires in the world.

And these same tires will this year tell it to hundreds of thousands of new users.

This Tale

Rim-Cutting is simply impossible with a No-Rim-Cut tire.

With old-type tires, rim-cutting ruins about 23 per cent.

No-Rim-Cut tires—our patent type—are 10 per cent over the rated size. And that, on the average, adds 25 per cent to the tire mileage.

These two features together save motor car owners a million dollars monthly.

The Goodyear Non-Skid is a double-thick tread, made of very tough rubber.

It is so thick that the blocks are cut very deep. So tough that the blocks are immensely enduring.

They grasp the road surface with a bulldog grip.

And these projections aren't separate. They meet at the base so the strains are distributed the same as with smooth-tread tires.

So this is by far the most efficient, the longest-lived non-skid.

Listen to It

Now let these tires tell their tale to you—tell it by mileage figures—tell it by lower tire bills.

They will tell it in a way which you can't dispute. And it will, in the long run, save you hundreds of dollars.

The evidence is—A quarter-million men who heard this tale have come to Goodyear tires.

Write for the Goodyear Tire Book—14th-year edition. It tells scores of facts you should know.

A VALENTINE PARTY OUT OF OLD LOVE-SONGS

AN EVENING of old love-songs and ballads acted out either in charades, dumb crambo, old-fashioned tableaux or pantomime pictures is one of the most delightful, time-honored and much neglected ways of spending St. Valentine's evening.

In a pretty parlor setting some one could sing the old songs sweetly, or read the familiar ballad slowly and impressively while the younger members of the family play out readily and charmingly the pictures suggested by the words of the poem or song. Ingenuity and ready wit are the most desired attributes in such an entertainment, and if the posing, the singing, the acting and the costumes are all done in the right spirit, the party is very sure to be a glad success.

Love's Old Sweet Song (Tableau)

A nice variation on to a St. Valentine's Eve of Love-Songs, which might possibly develop into something over-sentimental, is to burlesque here and there a song and ballad. "The Owl and the Pussy-Cat," "Auf Wiedersehen," "Forsaken Am I," "Robin Adair," "O Susanna," "Last Rose of Summer," "How Can I Leave Thee?" are delightfully funny in burlesque. "The Banks o' Doone," "John Anderson," "Annie Laurie," "Highland Mary," "Darby and Joan," "'Twas April," "Love's Old Sweet Song," "Believe Me, If All Those Endearing Young Charms," "Oh, Had We Some Bright Little Isle of Our Own," "Sweethearts," "My Love Is Like a Red, Red Rose," are especially adapted to effective tableaux. "The Ballad of the Oysterman," "Lord Ullen's Daughter," "The Lord of Burleigh," "Lochinvar," "The Three Fishers," "The Lady of Shallott," are proariously funny in burlesque pantomime. And the old negro love-songs and lullabys are beautifully adapted to old-fashioned moving tableaux.

A Little People's Prayer

O LORD, who lovest us little children, grant that our lifetime may be spent in the sweet, brave light of thy presence. Cleanse our hearts and scatter mists from our minds. Teach us clearly the lessons thou wouldst have us learn. Dry our tears when we are troubled and selfish and sweeten them for thy sake, so that we may never know the bitter taste of childhood's day without thee. Teach us clearly thy lovely ways, that, in growing up, we may not wander far. For ever forget that thou hast said of little children, "Of such is the kingdom of heaven."

A Good Game—Deer-Stalking

THIS is a game in which only two players take part, but it is exciting to watch. Both Deer and Stalker are blindfolded. They are then placed at opposite ends of a large table, and at a given moment they begin to move around it. The stalker's business is, of course, to catch the deer, and the deer's to avoid it; but neither must run out into the room. Absolute silence should be kept by the audience and players, and if felt slippers can be worn by the deer and its stalker so much the better.

Delicious Turkish Almond Balls

POUR boiling water on a half pound of shelled almonds, dry them on a soft towel, pound half of them into a paste and mix thoroughly with one-half a pound of confectioner's sugar, a quarter spoonful of orange flower extract, one egg (beaten), and two tablespoonfuls of white cornmeal. Rub the mixture smooth and roll into balls the size of hickory nuts. Roll the balls into the remainder of the almonds broken into small pieces, place on waxed paper, and bake in a moderate oven twenty minutes.

I Made It Myself

A Prize-Winner

WITH a solution of twelve ounces of water, seven ounces of glycerine, three ounces of Castile soap and a little vinegar, I blow soap bubbles that will keep for two days. I have suspended them from hatpins and small parlor ornaments, where they look very pretty.

Jenny's Errand

Now high, now low, now fast, now slow,
Come down the flakes of pure white snow;
Over the trees and fields they go,
While the frosty winds are blowing;
And there goes Mary Jane,
Her big umbrella I see quite plain,
Toddling along the old farm lane.
Where can she be going?
You cannot guess? Well, I'll tell you where.
There lives a woman bent with care,
Dim are her eyes, and gray is her hair,
And to her home is wee Jenny going
With a welcome this cold bleak day,
For she loves the old woman whose hair is so gray,
And there she goes with her good dog Tray,
Although it is blowing and snowing.

Wood (12), Harold King (9), Helen Dufendach (14), Dorcas Ahline (13), Katherin Turnbull (13), Jessie Canterberry (12). The names of other prize-winners will be published later. A Wonderful Picture

THE OAKLAND reminds you of a wonderful picture—the work of a great artist. Beautiful to the eye, complete in every detail, the car appeals to you at once as the creation of a master.

There are hundreds of five-passenger, four-cylinder cars—all similar in appearance—and there is the Oakland model of the same description, but a car so different, so beautiful, so individual, that if you saw every five-passenger, four-cylinder car made, you would pick the Oakland as the car of the group.

There are a score or more of six-cylinder models, but none of them has the fine characteristics of the Oakland Greyhound—6-60—a car of such striking lines that you gaze at it in sheer admiration and marvel at its wonderful symmetry and graceful appearance.

But we do not stop there. We are not satisfied in producing the most beautiful car in the world.

We give you beauty you cannot see—beauty you cannot feel—we give you beauty of construction, for the Oakland is as true inside mechanically as it is true outside artistically.

We give you a car that is mechanically right, for Oakland construction stands for maximum mechanical efficiency.

We give you unit power construction—the motor, clutch, and transmission on one line, because this method gives you increased power the minimum of friction and straight line drive.

We give you maximum accessibility which you must have in order to give the car proper attention after you own it and drive it.

In the matter of detail, comfort and convenience, the Oakland is modern, for there is incorporated the best of scientific progress made to date in automobile construction.

Models 42 and 6-60 are equipped with the Delco improved electric lighting, ignition and starting system. Gasoline tank is carried at the rear, making it very convenient for filling. There is a gasoline gauge on the tank.

There is an oil sight on the dash. The starter is on the dash. Everything is in a convenient position for use.

THE OAKLAND LINE FOR 1913

The Greyhound 6-60, four, five and seven passenger touring cars and a runabout for two. Price for all models, $2550.

Model 42, four and five passenger touring cars (five passenger touring car illustrated). Three passenger roadster. Price of all models, $1750.

CHANGES IN NEW YORK PULPITS

WHEN Dr. Cleland B. McAfee accepted the call to the chair of Dogmatic Theology in McCormick Theological Seminary at Chicago, the officials of the Lafayette Avenue Presbyterian Church in Brooklyn faced the difficult task of finding a pastor to succeed this man, who had been so noble a successor to his great predecessors, David Gregg and Theodore L. Cuyler. They have solved the problem by calling Dr. Charles C. Albertson, pastor of the Central Presbyterian Church at Rochester, N. Y.

The church to which Dr. Albertson goes was founded by Dr. Theodore L. Cuyler fifty-six years ago, and served by him for thirty years. Its membership is now nearly 2,400. There is a Sunday school of 1,500. Three semi-independent churches are aided financially and one Italian church wholly supported; also a whole mission station in Canton, China, with hospitals, schools and church. The congregation also spends $19,000 annually on a like plant in the Kentucky mountains, which has a technical and agricultural school in addition to the usual mission equipment.

Another accession to New York church life is the coming of Dr. Cyrus Townsend Brady, the famous author, from St. George's Episcopal Church, Kansas City, to the Church of the Ascension, Mount Vernon, N. Y.

While it is never safe to count on changes in Methodist pulpits before the bishop has read the appointments at the close of the annual conference, there seems to be good reason for believing that Dr. Charles L. Goodell, the splendidly successful pastor of Calvary M. E. Church, New York, will be appointed to St. Paul's Church to succeed Dr. George P. Eckman, recently elected editor of The Christian Advocate. The district superintendent and resident bishop are said to have already given their approval to this appointment.

Plans for Cape Verde Mission

REV. J. N. TOURINHO, of the Christian Portuguese Mission on San Antao, Cape Verde Islands, has been spending some months in this country in the interest of his work, and is soon to return to the field. Plans are being considered to unite Mr. Tourinho's mission with that of the Pentecostal Church of the Nazarene already established on the islands. Mr. Tourinho has made a successful record in his Cape Verde Mission. He is a converted Catholic and is full of zeal to deliver the message of a free and full salvation to the people of these islands so long under Catholic domination. Since the establishment of the Portuguese Republic there has been greater religious toleration on the Cape Verde Islands, and the door for the spread of the evangelical message is wider open than ever before.

A Novel of the Simple Life*

BY THE AUTHOR OF "MOTHER"

IF Kathleen Norris doesn't look out, some one will be saying that she is to be the long-expected "American Dickens." If she can master New York and its environs as she has mastered San Francisco and California, she will give any writer who chooses to enter the race for that distinction a smart chase. Yet perhaps, after all, this is a doubtful compliment nowadays, for many of our young folks don't like Dickens. But they will like Mrs. Norris, for she does for them what Dickens did for the young people of a half century ago. That is, she makes them have actual thrills of deep and noble emotion. Did not somebody define genius as the gift that makes one able to cause curious thrills to run up and down the spines of others? If that is the test, Mrs. Norris has it. And the thrills are not the doubtful sort that mean mere sensationalism. They are the thrills that have to do with the deep, tender, enduring things of life.

The Rich Mrs. Burgoyne might almost be called an amazing book. It is amazing in its simplicity. It seems the sort of book that any one could write; but the fact stands that no one else does write just such books as this and the always-to-be-loved Mother. The Rich Mrs. Burgoyne is not a preachment. But it would be hard to find in all of fiction, except perhaps in David Grayson's Adventures in Contentment, an equally strong appeal for the Simple Life. Miss Pratt sums up Mrs. Burgoyne—and Mrs. Norris: "She's simply found out what pays in life and what doesn't pay." She also sums up the trouble with most of the rest of us: "I think a good many of us were living too hard and fast ever to stop and think whether it was really worth while or not."

As to the story itself, it is hardly fair to folks who are going to read the book to give them hints of it. It is full of laughter and tenderness and beauty, of the smiles and the wiles of healthy children, of the distress and danger and of the possible pleasures of the poor, of the queer, shallow, fantastic notions of thoughtless and busy people, of the struggle and storm, the falls and victories of manhood, the gentle, simple, hearty life of an earnest, friendly and beautiful woman. The book is deftly illustrated by Mr. Hitchcock. But even without the illustrations it would be full of pictures—pictures with line and color, and even fragrance, intensely real. There is, of course, a love-story, unfolding itself with the deep and beautiful inevitableness with which love is linked to life. Above all, though it will delight the fancy of men and women, young or old, the book is one that every American mother ought to read.

Some people may find room for regret that, in emphasizing the need of personal loving in righting the world's wrongs, Mrs. Burgoyne was quite so positive that "nothing will ever be done by legislation." Some might wish there were more theology in the book; none can say there is too much. But the soundness of what theology there is may be estimated from this passage, which will give a taste of the story's style and spirit. Mrs. Brown, the doctor's wife, is inclined to think "dabbling" an inefficient method of bettering social conditions.

"Mrs. Burgoyne smiled: 'Well, and there was one more, the greatest of all, who didn't found any asylums, or lead any crusade—' She paused. 'Surely,' said the doctor quietly. 'Surely. I suppose that curing the lame here, and the blind there, and giving the people their fill of wine one day and of bread and fishes the next, might be called "dabbling" in these days. But the love that went with those things is warming the world yet.'"

These are Puffed Grains, steam exploded—eight times normal size. They float, for every grain is an airy wafer, filled with a myriad cells. They melt in the mouth, for the walls are thin. And every morsel tastes like toasted nut meats.

Fascinating Foods

Think how nut meats might taste, were they thin and crisp and porous.

These curious grains—Puffed Wheat and Rice—suggest that winning flavor.

That's why countless people mix these grains with fruit. They get a nut-like blend.

They use them in candy making—use them to garnish ice cream.

And a million dishes daily are consumed by people who like thin, almond-flavored, whole-grain wafers, served with cream or milk.

Millions Miss Them

Despite all this, there are other millions who never found them out.

They serve for breakfast cereal foods without this wondrous flavor.

In milk they serve bread or crackers, where these puffed and toasted wafers are ten times as good.

We urge those millions, for their own sakes, to find out what they miss.

These are the grains that are shot from guns. Every granule in them has been steam exploded.

Thus come the myriad cells. Thus comes the nut-like flavor. And thus digestion is made quick and easy and complete.

These are scientific foods, endorsed by every expert, every doctor. Whole grains are here made wholly digestible, and no other process does that.

But the foods, in addition, are immensely enticing. Millions of breakfasts, millions of suppers, are made inviting by them.

Tomorrow morning let them greet the folks around your table. Then judge by what they say.

Our Teeth are Better Than Our Parents' Teeth

Fifty years ago there was little known about the care of the teeth. The manufacturers of the few dentifrices then on the market did as best they could—and their preparations, in spite of grit and "druggy" taste, did some good. The grit served to clean teeth which never had known cleanliness, even though it scratched them too. The medicine taste appealed to those who thought nothing that tasted good could do good.

Within the past few years people have come to a realization that proper care of the teeth demands a dentifrice without grit—and that the teaching of children to care for their teeth demands a pleasant tasting dentifrice.

And so we have come to

Here then is a real dentifrice:

It cleans thoroughly, safely. There is no druggy taste—it is not over-medicated. Over-medication is frowned upon by dentists and their patients. A pleasant taste is recognized as an advantage in starting young people on the road to Good Teeth—Good Health. Ribbon Dental Cream is an easy riding vehicle on that road.

To Mothers, Dentists and Other Teachers

Regular care of the teeth by young people now will avoid years of regret later on. We do not go so far as the New York Times, which said in a recent editorial:

> "A boy whose teeth are bad, whose mouth and throat are swollen and germ-laden, whose nasal, oral and ocular passages are stopped up, blinks when he looks at the blackboard, fails to hear his name when called upon, is bowed by defective breathing, and is pained in digestion. He becomes a truant, rebellious and a liar. Give him an oral cleansing and complete masticatory repairs, and you begin to make of him a gentleman and a scholar." [The underlining is ours]

We quote this, although we do not agree that neglected teeth necessarily make a child untruthful. But we do say that good teeth are necessary for good digestion, and good digestion is necessary for good health.

So that more may know Ribbon Dental Cream, a trial tube (formerly 4c) will now be sent for a 2c stamp. If you wish our instructive "Oral Hygiene" merely say "Send the Book." It is free.

YOU will find that mothers who are careful about the temperature of the children's bath are just as particular about the soap.

Invariably they use Ivory.

They do this because they realize how important it is to use a mild, pure soap and because they know how grateful Ivory Soap is to the tenderest skin and what a buoyant feeling of perfect, healthy cleanliness it gives.

The more critical people are, the more they appreciate Ivory Soap for the bath and toilet. It offers every desired quality: It lathers freely. It rinses easily. It is pure. It is mild. It is free from uncombined alkali. It is made of the best materials of which soap can be made. It is inexpensive. And—it floats.

EVANGELISM UNDER FIRE

DR. CHAPMAN UTTERS A WARNING AGAINST SENSATIONALISM, COMMERCIALISM AND VULGARITY, WHICH MUST BE DISCARDED IF EVANGELISTIC INFLUENCE IS TO BE PRESERVED

BY J. WILBUR CHAPMAN, D.D.

N THIS far-away land of Australia I have read in the American papers an account of the Conference on Evangelism held during the month of September in the Moody Bible Institute. Two sentences in the reports which have reached us have arrested my attention. The one was read m a letter to Dr. Gray, the Dean of the Institute, in which the writer is ported saying that "evangelism in the United States has developed into mmercialism and professionalism." The other is attributed to my friend . F. E. Taylor, pastor of the First Baptist Church, Indianapolis, in which is reported to have said: "When I began my evangelistic work, a well-own evangelist asked me to come to his cottage that he might teach me the icks of the trade and tell me how to secure an offering, 'for,' said he, 'I have t the other evangelists skinned a mile in this part of my work.'" I uld wish that this portion of the conference had been held behind sed doors. It does not make Christian work any easier to ve the world and those opposed to evangelism an opportu-ty to rejoice over criticism made of the work and rkers, however just and necessary these criticisms ay be, and it would seem only fair that Dr. Taylor ould have given the name of the evangelist who id he had "them skinned a mile" in taking an ering. It hardly seems fair that evangelists in neral should rest under such a charge. I am ping, however severe the arraignment of evan-lists and evangelistic workers may have been, e conference may do good. It is, however, a tle bit unfair to censure all evangelists because me have failed, just as it would be unjust to raign all ministers because some of them have rfeited their right to stand behind the sacred sk. I have not been much in the United States r the past three years; but I have no hesitation saying that the evangelists whom I know inti-ately, and with whom I was for so long a time sociated in work, were neither "professional" nor ommercial": they were men of God without excep-on. They made great sacrifices to do their work, and t one of them received an adequate income, and yet never heard them complain. That there has been a drift ward extreme sensational evangelism in the United States, one knows better than I, and no one deplores it more. Sensa-onalism, commercialism, vulgarity, the greed for money wherever these things exist—have no rightful place in angelism, and the church has a right to cry out in no uncertain nes against such things, and to withhold her approval of the en who continue to work along such lines. All Christian work more difficult to-day than even three years ago. Pastors every-here are bemoaning this fact, as well as evangelists. We have found all over e world that men are laboring, in many instances, with almost breaking arts because of the sparse results to be seen as the result of their labors. evangelists are extreme and unwise in method; if they make wild and ndignified statements; if they descend to vulgar expressions, I am wonder-g if the church has not some responsibility for such a condition of affairs. he does not train her evangelists, nor does she control them. They are, as a ule, a law to themselves, and sometimes they abuse their liberty. I am of the opinion that, in some of the present-day evangelism, the church is simply reaping her harvest because evangelists have not been properly trained, and have not labored under denominational control. It is true, many are being added to the membership of the church by the use of methods now under fire; but I think the need of to-day is, not for a bigger church, but a better one.

There are some severe criticisms which have justly been made against some present-day evangelism. (1) The fact that enormous sums of money are being paid some evangelists for their work. (2) The vulgar expressions used and the high pressure methods adopted to lead people to a professed confession of Christ. (3) Commercialism, which has in some instances crept into the work and not been rebuked. (4) The disposition shown by some to attack pastors and assail the church. I think there are some things which evangelists will need to do, and do quickly, if our position of influence is to be maintained. (1) Revise some of the methods which are so justly condemned. (2) Cease attacking other Christian workers, simply because they do not agree with us. (3) Avoid the subject of criticisms, high or low; not one evangelist in one hundred knows about either. (4) Preach a positive message of salvation by the death of Christ. (5) Be absolutely true and faithful in the presentation of God's Word as the final authority. (6) Be satisfied with a reasonable income, and cease at once questionable methods of securing that. (7) Be absolutely right in heart and life, and thus fitly represent the Master we present to others. I think that no evangelism is worth while, save that which makes the pastor's work easier, and the church more to be respected and loved. I am sure that no evangelistic method is to be approved save that which can be used by the pastor himself in his regular church work. The ideal for the church after all is pastoral evangelism. The work that we evangelists do is an emergency work. There is a place for the evangelist. He is the pastor's helper, not his critic. If he is called of God to do His work, and does it well, he will be the pastor's friend. Mr. Alexander and I have found that where fields have been well prepared for our coming, and where the work has been well followed up, the results have been highly satisfactory; where preparation has not been made, the results have been disappointing. We have emphasized the immediate acceptance and public confession of Christ as a Saviour, personal work, the adoption of family worship, the proper support and sympathy given to the ministry, and in our second journey round the world we have found, after a lapse of three years, that the results of such services are abiding. Three years ago in Sydney, Australia, about 150 street-car men gave themselves to Christ: they formed themselves into two bands of Christian workers, and these men state publicly that, during the three years of their Christian work, they have led between 2,500 and 3,000 others to Christ.

I believe in evangelism, and I believe in evangelists. These are critical days, but they will pass. While they are on, let us be patient and kind, and above all Christlike; and when a new day breaks, as break it must, let us be glad!

THE SIMPLE WEDDING AT LYNDHURST

IF THAT old adage, "Happy is the bride that the sun shines on," still holds good, Miss Helen Miller Gould had a prophecy of happiness when, on January 22, she was married to Mr. Finley Johnson Shepard. Brilliant sunshine flooded Lyndhurst, the beautiful and simple old country home of the bride, where Rev. Daniel Russell, LL.D., the pastor of the local Presbyterian church, performed the short but impressive ceremony. Though no wedding of recent years has attracted more attention or called forth more universal good wishes, there were only about one hundred and forty guests present, and they were almost all relatives of the bride and groom. There were present, too, all the servants of Miss Gould's different homes and all the old retainers of the Lyndhurst estate. It was that kind of a wedding at which the gardener and the silver-haired dairyman, in corduroys and hobnailed boots, formed part of the group in the hall.

The south drawing-room had been transformed into a garden of palms and lilies of the valley. The hall was hung with wild Alabama smilax and decorated with great vases of American Beauty roses. In a music room just off the hall, an orchestra of forty pieces played as the guests arrived, and the final flutter of preparation subsided.

At twelve-thirty the bridal procession entered the south drawing-room and passed up the aisle of white satin ribbon and bride roses in time to the wedding music from Lohengrin. Dr. Russell, who led the procession, was followed by the bride's nieces, Helen and Dorothy Gould, aged ten and eight years respectively. The little girls wore frocks of pale pink satin veiled with lace, pink satin French caps, and white silk stockings and slippers. Each carried a basket of pink roses. The bride, accompanied by her brother, George J. Gould, appeared next. She wore a robe of ivory satin with long sleeves, V-shaped neck, and a long train. Duchess and rose point lace, with seed pearl embroidery, draped the gown, and were caught up at both sides with sprays of orange blossoms. A veil of wonderful rose point lace, the gift of the bride's sister, the Duchess of Talleyrand, swept from the head, where it was secured with a coronet of orange blossoms to the end of the train. The bride wore a string of pearls which had belonged to her mother, and which, it is believed, were once the property of Empress Josephine of France, and a diamond pendant, the gift of the groom. She carried a shower bouquet of lilies of the valley and a point lace handkerchief, the gift of Mrs. Russell Sage.

Mr. Shepard and his brother, who acted as groomsman, awaited the bridal party under the bower of palms, ascension lilies, and white roses. The wedding music changed to the solemn chords of Handel's Largo as Dr. Russell performed the simple Scotch Presbyterian ring ceremony. Then, as the last words were said, came Mendelssohn's Wedding March, which rang through the rooms till it merged gradually into the Star-Spangled Banner, which was played in honor of Mrs. Shepard, as a benefactor of the United States Army and Navy.

After a few minutes of merry congratulations, the guests went to the rose- and smilax-trimmed dining-room, where a buffet breakfast was served by Delmonico's. As the bride and groom sat in one of the big bay windows they looked out for the first time at the newspaper men and photographers and villagers who were keeping watch outside. The bride caught sight of some acquaintances among the reporters and bowed and smiled merrily. The salutation was returned by the entire group of pleased though disappointed reporters.

As the guests departed, many camera clicked, but no one succeeded in snapping the bridal couple. About five o'clock Mr. and Mrs Shepard went for an hour's motor ride and returned to Lyndhurst to dine. A little after dinner one of the steamers passing up the Hudson played her searchlight on Lyndhurst till the bride and groom stepped out upon the west veranda to be saluted by three resounding blasts of the whistle.

Thousands of cable and telegraph messages arrived during the afternoon and evening, and two men stood guard over the wonderful array of jeweled and precious gifts, which Mrs. Shepard received from her relatives and intimate friends. From many who have cheered and blessed the name of Helen Gould for her philanthropy came remembrances whose sentimental value was much greater than their intrinsic worth. Some of these gifts were as follows:

Enlisted men of the United States Atlantic Fleet—A gold loving-cup, appropriately inscribed.

Lyndhurst Sewing School teachers—A writing tablet with a gold fountain pen.

Enlisted men and officers of the Atlantic Reserve Fleet, Philadelphia Navy Yard—A silver loving-cup.

Commander in chief and officers of the United States Atlantic Fleet—A loving-cup of silver.

Soldiers of Fortress Monroe, Va.—A tall silver loving-cup.

Enlisted men of the Twenty-ninth Infantry, Governor's Island—A standard supporting a three-handled silver loving-cup.

Women's Auxiliary, Young Men's Christian Association of the New York University—A silver vase.

Railroad Young Men's Christian Association of the Western lines, in which the bride and her family are directly interested—A jewel box and clock, the former being a replica of the private car Atalanta, used by Jay Gould, and the latter a model of the Railroad Y. M. C. A. Building in St. Louis.

Officers and enlisted men of the United States Atlantic Submarine Flotilla—A silver bowl with submarine etched on it.

School of Applied Science, New York University—Leather-bound and engraved testimonial.

New York University—A sterling silver plaque, appropriately inscribed, with relief of Gould Memorial Library and the Hall of Fame, both buildings gifts of the bride to the university.

Bible Teachers' Training School—A beautiful illuminated book.

WEDDING JOYS AT THE BOWERY MISSION

THE cheer and beauty of the marriage ceremonies and festivities reached all the way from Lyndhurst to the Bowery. Announcement had been made at the Bowery Mission on Monday night that a thousand men would be feasted there on Wednesday evening as the wedding guests of Miss Gould. It would probably be impossible to find anywhere the record of such a celebration. There is one description in literature that parallels it. It is found in one of those master stories called "parables," told by the Master himself—the Wedding of the King's Son. The story, as it is told in Luke, follows immediately the exhortation to do this very thing: "When thou makest a feast, call the poor, the maimed, the lame, the blind: and thou shalt be blessed."

One of the Five Groups at the Wedding Dinner at the Bowery Mission

Elaborate and gigantic preparations had been made in the Mission kitchen, and when the happy hour of six-thirty arrived on Wednesday, "all things were ready." As early as two o'clock that mysterious "line" had begun to form, which always comes into being on the Bowery at any hour of the day or night when it is announced that free food is to be given these always hungry unfortunates.

It required considerable tact and strength on the part of the policemen and Mission officers to separate the first two hundred men from the clamoring thousand, though there had been practically perfect order among the waiting men. Inside the Mission auditorium were light and welcome and good cheer. After a brief service, word came that the dining preparations were complete and the men filed down to take their places at table and eat a royal wedding supper. Meanwhile the auditorium was filled again. The meetings and the feasting continued till twelve-thirty, almost up to the time for opening the "bread line." Speakers and singers came in relays. Governor Sulzer could not be present but sent a hearty telegram. Mr. Frederick W. Schleder, organist of St. Nicholas' Reformed Church, New York, which Mrs. Shepard attends, played the wedding marches on the Mission's great

THE BISHOP'S "CHICKEN BRIGADE"

BY FRANK W. WARNE, M. E. Bishop of Southern Asia

AFTER completing twenty-five years of missionary service in India, I came home to the General Conference held in Minneapolis during May, 1912. On Sunday morning, May 5, I took the service in the Joyce Memorial Church. I told some of my experiences in the Orient, of five visits to the Philippine Islands and about the millions of the poor in India. I also told of the marvelous outpourings of the Holy Spirit that have come to our Christians in India. I told the story of their marvelous prayer life, their study of the Bible, and the sacrifices they have made and the persecution they have endured in order to become Christians, so that many hearts in the audience were greatly moved.

At the close of the service the pastor, Dr. W. E. J. Gratz, asked his people to come to the front and shake my hand, adding: "Any one wishing to help the cause may do so by giving the bishop a contribution." I shook hands with several hundred people, but no one gave me any money except one lovely little girl, who gave me fifty cents. After the service I went home with the pastor and soon learned that the giver was his little daughter. In a few minutes two other children in the home each gave me fifty cents. The children's names are Doris, Wesley and Gretchen Gratz.

Then I learned what I think is a most interesting story, and I am going to tell it to you. An uncle the autumn before had given each of the children a chicken, which they tenderly cared for in the basement of the house through the long winter months until the chickens had become playmates and pets and learned to do all sorts of curious and interesting things.

When spring came, there was no provision in the household arrangements to further take care of the chickens, so it was decided that the chickens were to be killed and eaten.

Doris, Wesley and Gretchen, the Pet Chickens and the Fifty Cents

First, the family bought Wesley's chicken for fifty cents. But when it was killed and cooked and put upon the table, and the children realized that it was Wesley's pet, with which they had all played, that they were sitting down to eat, they began to cry and there was such weeping and lamenting that there was no dinner eaten in that house that day. Neither father nor mother could eat, and I was told that Wesley did not sleep until the small hours of the morning, weeping for his dead chicken. The outcome of all this was that no one would kill the other chickens, so the family decided to sell them to the children of a neighbor, who continued to pet them, and Doris and Gretchen could go to see their former pets.

During the sermon I have mentioned, Doris was sitting beside her mother in the church and became greatly interested, and at the close asked her mother, "May I give my pet chicken money to that bishop?" The mother answered, "It is yours, you can do as you please." Then Doris said, "May I run home and get it now?" and when permission was given, she asked, "May I give it all?" "Talk to Jesus about it as you go," the mother answered. Then Doris jumped up and ran home so fast that she was all out of breath, and she took every cent of the chicken money and brought it back and joined the handshaking procession before the altar and gave her all to me.

After I returned to my hotel, I was greatly impressed by the fact that I had the "all" of three charming Christian children. I felt that somehow I ought to make such giving live in the memory of the Christian Church, but the question was, "What can I do with only $1.50?" After thinking it over for some time, I came down to supper and told my "pet chicken" story, and my friends around the table said, "You must have some more pet chickens," so they began to throw fifty-cent pieces at me from every part of the table. I went back to the church, and the story spread, and people began to give me the price of still more pet chickens, so that by bedtime I had quite a little sum. But still there was the problem, "What can I do with it?" I prayed about it and thought about it, and the next morning, while having devotions, I began to see as in a vision a great brigade of American children collecting "chickens" from their friends and giving their own pocket money to help evangelize the millions of heathen children in India, who know little about Jesus, and many of whom have never even heard his name.

The chief goddess of these forty-five millions of people of Bengal is Kali. "Kali" means "black," and she is black and very large. She is the Goddess of Cruelty, and the people do not love her, but fear her. Her tongue is as red as blood, suggesting that she loves human blood, and it hangs almost to her girdle. Around her neck and down to her girdle hangs a necklace of the skulls of people she has slaughtered. From her girdle, all around her, hang the arms of little children which she has cut off just above the elbow. The people know nothing of worshiping a good God who loves them; only an angry, blood-thirsty goddess, of whom they are afraid! Goats are sacrificed to her every day to satisfy her thirst for blood. I have seen her when the blood of the goats sacrificed that day near the temple stood in pools ankle deep.

The Calcutta Press prints literature in Bengali, a language that is spoken by forty-five million people.

These people have lived for centuries in that intensely hot climate of Central India, and are brown, but are of the same branch of the human family as Americans and Europeans, and are like us in features. I think the children are the chubbiest, loveliest little brown-skinned, black-eyed, black-haired babies in the world. I love to play with them. They are "real children," but most have never heard of Jesus.

I was riding in the train one day, and when it stopped I asked the people standing near by, "What do you know about Jesus?" and the leader replied, "W'uh hamara gaun men nahi rahta hai," which means, "He does not live in our village." They have never heard the name of Jesus; they thought I was simply asking for some Indian man who lived in some other village. Among these millions of people now there are many who are learning to read, and our purpose is to give them something to read about our Saviour.

The price of a chicken will print one hundred tracts that will enable several hundred people to read about Jesus. Don't you want to tell hundreds of people about Jesus?

For a number of years, while in India, among these people, I kept in mind a millionaire friend in America, and hoped and prayed that some time he would give me money enough to do this great work. Since I have been in America I have spent two days and two nights with that millionaire, trying to get him interested in India's children. But, after all, I am not so specially interested in what wealthy people may do as in the little folks themselves. Now I have organized a "pet chicken brigade," and I commend it not to my millionaire friend, but to the children of America, that the millions in India, through them, may learn about Jesus. The price of one chicken will make you a member. I hope some children will have rich friends who will give them a number of chickens. Then you will become a real little missionary, helping to let the heathen know about Jesus.

[Since writing this article for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bishop Warne has returned to India, but any reader who is interested in the progress of the bishop's crusade, and wants to know more about it or to send a contribution, can address "Chicken Brigade," THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York City.]

TOPICS OF INTEREST AT HOME AND ABROAD

—THE PHENOMENALLY OPEN winter is having a serious effect on the ice business. So little has yet been harvested that there are strong probabilities of an ice famine during the hot weather of the coming summer.

—ON JANUARY 16, the Home Rule Bill passed the British House of Commons by a majority of 110 votes. The long and determined opposition of Ulster availed nothing. It was even proposed, in the last stages of the debate, that Ulster be excluded; but this was not seriously considered. There was talk, too, of Ulster using force within its own territory in the event of the bill passing. The leaders on both sides are now represented as favoring conciliation.

—OUR FRENCH FRIENDS do not take their political duties so seriously as we do. In the late French presidential election, this was made evident when the Assembly met to vote. The proceedings were interrupted by a newspaper editor who pressed into the Chamber announcing that one of the leading candidates had expressed a desire to perforate another leading candidate with a rapier, and that the duel would take place within a few hours. This episode was scarcely over when again came an interruption. Some excited citizen was outside waving a large pistol and threatening to annihilate the Assembly if it dared to proceed to a vote before he got "his rights." Nevertheless, the vote went on, and M. Poincaré was duly elected. Then, after the Assembly adjourned and when one of the defeated candidates appeared and entered his carriage to go home, he was surrounded by a chain of members who, being in the mood for still further diversion, celebrated his defeat by circling about the carriage and serenading him with a patriotic air having a somewhat derisive refrain, which intimated that the candidate in the carriage should be driven to the Charenton Lunatic Asylum. Thus it will be seen that the French are a characteristically gay people, and take even the more serious business of life in a light and happy vein. Of course, there was no duel and nobody was hurt, not even in their feelings. Such things are expected in Paris.

THE GREAT SACRIFICE

A SERMON

BY

Rev. R. A. Torrey, D.D.*

TEXT: "It is finished." John 19: 30

THESE words are deeply significant. According to John's record, they are the last words of our Lord before his death. In all probability the words recorded by Luke, "Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit," followed. What did this dying utterance of our Lord and Saviour mean? What was finished?

I. First of all, his own sufferings were finished. Long before this Jesus had said, "I have a baptism to be baptized with, and how am I straitened until it be accomplished [or finished]!" From the beginning of his ministry, the shadow of the cross darkened the Saviour's life. He knew he must die (John 2: 19-21). He knew he was "the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world," and "the Lamb of God" could only take away sin by bearing it in his own body, by dying for it. He recoiled from death; he was a man, and had the horror of death that is natural to a real man; he knew what death meant as the extreme of Satan's power as no other man ever knew it. As he was more full of life than any other man, the very Prince of Life, he recoiled from death as no other man ever did. Furthermore, his death was to be a sin-offering, and, as the Holy One of God, he recoiled from everything that had to do with sin. Time and again did he recur to his coming suffering and death, and always with pain and agony. Indeed, it seems to me that in the ages before his incarnation he must have looked forward with pain to the suffering and shame and rejection and death and curse of God that He knew he must suffer to redeem man.

The Hour of Sacrifice

At last the closing hours have come. There had been the awful struggle of Gethsemane; the mockery and scourging; the crown of thorns and the judgment hall; the weary journey beneath the crushing cross to Golgotha; the nails had gone crashing through the flesh and nerves and muscles of hands and feet; the hours of distended and torturing members and staring bones and exposure to shame had passed; the maddened priests and rebel mob had mocked the loving Saviour, and reproach had broken his heart; there had been that mysterious and appalling cloud that hid even his Father's face, and wrung from him the cry, "My God! My God! Why hast thou forsaken me?" There had been the swollen tongue, the consuming fever and the agonizing cry, "I thirst"; but the last moment had finally come, and with a triumphant cry, "It is finished: Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit," he gave up his spirit. The dread and horror of all those years, yes, of the ages, was over. Oh, I do thank God for those words, "It is finished." Yes, it is finished. The suffering and agony and shame, the atoning death of Jesus Christ, were all necessary, and they were awful beyond what any man has ever fathomed or dreamed; but it is finished, all finished. To me there are scarcely sweeter words in the whole Gospel than those.

We too must bear the cross with Christ. If we are to reign with him, we must also suffer with him, and none of us can tell how much we may be called upon to suffer—of course, it will be little in comparison with his suffering—but however fierce the trial may be, the day will come when we can look back upon it all and say with our Master, "It is finished."

The Accomplished Mission

II. In the second place, the mission upon which God had sent him into this world was finished. It was not finished until he had died, but death was only an instant ahead, and in anticipation of it he cries, "It is finished!" The divinely given and difficult work is done. Jesus came into the world upon a divinely given mission; the Father had given him certain works to finish (John 5: 36); it was his very meat to finish this work of the Father (John 4: 34); the night before, in prayer in anticipation of this hour, he had joyfully said to the Father, "I have glorified thee on the earth; I have finished the work which thou gavest me to do." Now at last it was indeed done. There was nothing more to add to the work; death had come as the climax; he had simply to give up his spirit unto the Father, and this he was now doing. Oh, with what joyous triumph he contemplated that glorious and arduous work committed to him by the Father, completed, perfected, finished, at last! Have you ever had a work laid upon you by God to do; a work that took years; a work that cost arduous toil and bitter pain, and has it at last stood before you perfected, the last touch added to it? If you have, that may give you some idea, some very faint idea, of what that cry meant that rang out from the cross, that most awful but greatest and most glorious day of the world's history. Jesus looked at the perfected work as he laid it at his Father's feet and cried, "It is finished."

The Prophecies Fulfilled

III. In the third place, the prophecies concerning the sufferings and death of the Messiah which angels and the prophets themselves had desired to look into (I Peter 1: 11-13), were finished. This is the immediate thought of the context. The Old Testament prophets, centuries before, had set forth step by step the sufferings the coming Messiah would meet in redeeming his people. One by one Jesus had fulfilled these details of Old Testament prophecy. He had been pierced through hands and feet; his bones, drawn out of joint by the tension of crucifixion; the mob about the cross had stared at him; had hurled the very words of derision that had been predicted centuries before; the soldiers had divided his garments among them and cast lots upon his vesture just as predicted. One prophecy had remained unfulfilled: "In my thirst they gave me vinegar to drink" (Ps. 69: 21). Jesus therefore, consumed with torturing thirst, says, "I thirst"; a sponge is filled with the prophesied vinegar and put to his mouth; the last prediction of the long list of sufferings and dishonor that should be heaped upon the Son of Man (which Jesus had doubtless conned again and again until they were indelibly printed upon his mind) is fulfilled; and with a cry of relief and victory he exclaims, "It is finished!" (Luke 18: 31; 22: 37; Acts 13: 29).

The Curse of the Broken Law

IV. But there was something else that was finished. The work of atonement was finished. God is holy and we are sinners. Where there is sin there must be wrath and penalty from a holy God; there must be agony and shame and separation from God and death; the curse of the broken law must be borne. Jesus had borne it. "Him who knew no sin he made to be sin on our behalf; that we might become the righteousness of God in him" (II Cor. 5: 21, R. V.). He had borne our sins in his own body on the cross (I. Peter 2: 24); he had "redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us" (Gal. 3: 13); our sin had been made to strike on him (Isa. 53: 6); and now it was about over; the work was fast drawing to a completion; in a moment it would be completed; perfect atonement would be made, an atonement so satisfying to God, so all-sufficient that it would cover all the sins of the vilest sinner that would accept it; and Jesus cried, "It is finished!" Thank God, it is finished. There is absolutely nothing left for you or me to do to atone for sin; it is all done.

> Jesus paid it all,
> All the debt I owe;
> Sin had left a crimson stain,
> He washed it white as snow.

The Only Atonement

"It is finished." Oh, that men would believe this! How many are trying to add something to the finished work of Christ to secure the favor of God! Men say, "I have sinned so grievously, I must surely do something to atone for sin." No, nothing—nothing whatever. Jesus did it all. He finished the work. All we have to do is to accept the pardon and justification purchased; and then serve God not in the faint hope of adding anything to the finished work of Christ, not to atone for sin, but in glad gratitude that sin is atoned for, that Jesus did it all; that the work is finished. When we gather to-day at that table upon which appear the emblems of the finished work, as we put the bread and wine to our lips, let us do it knowing "it is finished," that there is absolutely nothing left for us to do as far as atoning for sin is concerned (Heb. 10: 14).

V. Another thing was finished; that is, the Mosaic law, as far as its claims on the believer are concerned. Paul says in Rom. 10: 4, "Christ is the end of the law unto righteousness to every one that believeth" (R. V.), and again in Col. 2: 14, "Blotting out the handwriting of ordinances that was against us, which was contrary to us, and took it out of the way, nailing it to his cross"; every claim of the Mosaic law was settled and the law itself done away by the death of Christ upon the cross. There are many who forget this—the Galatians of Paul's day did, and tried to bring Christians under the Jewish law of circumcision. Legalists in our day forget it, and try to bring us under the Jewish seventh-day Sabbath law. This was all finished in the cross (cf. Gal. 2: 14-17). This does not mean that we are now at liberty to lead lawless lives. Paul explains our true position in Rom. 7: 4, where he tells us that we are now not under the Mosaic law, but joined to a new husband, that is Christ, to live out the Christ life, to walk even as he walked, to live a life of love and sacrifice of self.

The Death-Knell of Satan's Power

VI. There was one thing more that was finished at the cross: that is, Satan's power. "Through death," we are told in Heb. 2: 14 (R. V.), Jesus "brought to naught him that had the power of death; that is, the devil." In Col. 2: 15 (R. V.) Paul says, "Having put off from himself the principalities and the powers, he made a show of them openly, triumphing over them in it" (that is, in the cross). And Jesus himself says as the coming death on the cross looms up before him, "Now is the judgment of this world; now shall the prince of this world be cast out" (John 12: 31). The death of Christ on the cross was the death-knell to Satan's power. It seemed the moment of his mightiest triumph; it was the moment of his utter defeat. It is true that he is not yet chained and cast into the bottomless pit; but the death-knell has sounded; his power is broken and the glorious end hastens on—"it is finished."

Oh, how full of meaning are the three words of Christ's triumphant cry from the cross, "It is finished." The awful agony and shame of the Son of God are finished; the mission upon which the Father sent him to the earth is finished; the prophecies of the Old Testament regarding his death and accompanying sorrows are finished; the atoning work is finished; the law of condemnation, death and bondage is finished; Satan's power is finished.

"It is finished!" Hallelujah!

MENDER OF MEN

.WAYS he was the dullard, always he Failed of the quick grasp and the flaming word t still he longed for. Always other men ran him for the prize, till in him stirred k presage of defeat, and blacker doubts love and wisdom regnant; and he styled iself disciple of the obvious, destined failure, blundering fool, and smiled.

with the smile went heartbreak. Then one day ittle lad crept wailing to his knee, sping a broken toy. "I slipped and fell
I broke it. Make another one for me."
ereat the answer: "I am but a fool.
n make nothing." "You can mend it then."
least I'll try." And patiently and slow wrought until the toy was whole again.

I so he learned his lesson. In the world, bustling world that has no time to spare its hurt children, all compassionate sought, and seeking found them everywhere.
I here he wove again a shattered dream,
I there bound up a bruised and broken soul;
I, comrade to the fallen and the faint, steadied wavering feet to reach their goal.

gotten were his dreams of self and fame;
ever gone the bitterness of loss;
counted he his futile struggles vain, ce they had taught him how to share the cross weaker brothers wisely; and henceforth knew no word but "service." In it lay bition, work, and guerdon, and he poured whole soul in the striving of the day.

d when at last he rested, as Love led, now it crowned him. And they came with tears—se sorrowing hearts that he had comforted—ring the garnered triumphs of their years.
ot ours, but his, the glory. Dreams come true, nptations conquered, lives made clean again, these and we ourselves are work of him om God had set the task of mending men."

Following the Multitude

OD warned his chosen people in early history not to go with the ultitude to do evil. This implies at the example of many of the prossed people of God was often wrong.
hen Christ was here, the multitude ied, "Crucify him!"

Our popular motto, "Vox populi, ually false, as the saloons attest.

ssing church.

Liberality is popular with the

Giving God His Opportunity in You

BY DR. O. S. MARDEN

TO GIVE God his opportunity in me." These words—a line in a little poem—not long ago caught my attention, and have haunted me ever since. There are volumes in them for every human being, for our success or failure in life depends wholly on whether we give God his opportunity in us or not. Most of us give the Creator a very meager opportunity in our lives because we shut him out by ignorance, by vicious living, by failure to develop our possibilities. Most of our powers are merely potential. They are not living, practical forces; they are still asleep. They have never been aroused. We must keep ourselves up to standard, always in trim, with all our reserve force drilled, trained, ready. The greatest thing a human being can do is to put himself in a position, by preparation and training, where God can get the most out of him, can make the greatest possible man of him.

ARE you giving God the opportunity to call out of your thought and energies the great purpose and plan which he implanted in you at birth, the purpose which runs in your blood, the plan that is indicated by the very structure of your brain? Are you doing the thing you can do most perfectly—your strongest, best thing, cleanest thing—or are you doing the weak thing, that which appeals only to the smaller part of you? Does your career bring into play your weakness instead of your strength? Does it show you up to an infinite disadvantage, or does it call into play the greatest number of your strongest faculties? Is your vocation your self-expression in its entirety, or does it bring to light only the small, weak man in you, the pygmy instead of the giant?

The men and women who stand out like giants, colossal milestones on the path of civilization, who have done great things for their own and all succeeding ages, have been those who let God's purpose work in them. They are those who let no privation, no suffering, no obstacles, hinder them from co-operating with God in working out the best that was in them, from obeying the sealed command which the Creator had given them at their birth. There are a great many people who are not giving God his opportunity in them, because their work is a mere mockery of their possibilities. It is an insult to the Creator to so distort the message which he has written in every fiber of their being. It is a sin against self and against heaven to botch one's whole life by refusing to work to the program which is outlined in one's very constitution, and through laziness, indifference, or greed, to substitute an inferior one. The Creator never intended you or me for work which would call into play merely our brute qualities, and develop the lower side of our nature. The animal propensities in man were intended to be suppressed. It is the good in us, not the brute, the man, not the trickster or schemer, that the Infinite wishes to call out in us.

I RECENTLY saw a splendid specimen of manhood working as a section hand on a railroad. Nature had marked him with superiority. His form was perfect, and his strong face was lighted up with intelligence. He looked as though he really should have been president of the railroad instead of a section hand. But there he was; held down, because he had no education, and evidently no idea of what it was possible for him to do for himself. Here, in truth, was a giant doing a pygmy's work, a mark for wonderment to all who saw him.

We see the same thing every day. In fact, the great majority of people are using but a very small part of themselves; their greatest power is often wholly unutilized. They could double their efficiency if they only thought they could, if they only could discover themselves. They have resources locked within them from which they have never drawn, because they never found the key to them.

Thousands of young people are longing to get on, and wondering at the "luck" which enables others to advance faster than they do, who little imagine that the same "luck" resides in themselves, that the power to advance is in their grasp, that the opportunity lies in the slumbering power which they must awaken, or remain forever nobodies. One of the greatest services we can render to people who are using only a small part of their power is to show them their possibilities and help them to free themselves from their fetters.

I HAVE seen gleams in the face and eyes of a man that have let you look into a higher country," says Carlyle. There is that in every man if he only knows how to draw it out which will lead him to the "higher country."

The greatest forces are not in the thunder, or the fire of volcanoes, or the storms and tempests which wreck and ruin, but in the silent, unseen motions of nature. Scientists tell us that there is enough chemical force in a few acres of growing grass to run all the machinery in the United States. Yet if we go into the meadows and listen, we will hear only the song of the birds, the murmur of the water in the brook, as it rushes over the pebbles, or the rustling of the wind in the grass. All else is silent, but we feel that we are in the midst of a mighty power, that tremendous operations are going on under our very feet—operations which would astonish the greatest scientist, which would make the most learned philosopher painfully conscious of the limitations of his knowledge. If we could only see and handle the forces which are calling the coloring out of the sunlight, forcing the sap and nourishment up from the black soil, mixing the paints for the thousand hues in the tinting of flower and leaf, we should be lost in wonder and admiration. Here is power, indeed! Here are the mechanical forces working in silence, sufficient to crush the Alps or to hurl the ocean from its bed!

We are all reservoirs of power, and what we make of ourselves, what we achieve in life, what we do for the world, is dependent on the extent to which we draw on our hidden forces, to the extent that we give God his opportunity in us.

SUCH A LITTLE WHILE

WE'VE such a little while together,
So short a way
To keep through storm and sunny weather—
Then, day by day,
Let's strive the journey brief to gladden,
And watch that we
No fellow traveler's heart may sadden—
Let's patient be
And forward march, with love sustaining
The weak that fall;
New strength for our own burdens gaining
By sharing all.

Let's guide the faltering feet, upholding
When courage fails;
With pity sweet sad lives enfolding
Through life's dark gales.
Let's strive to make the march less dreary
With light and song,
And loving deeds, till hearts aweary
With hope grow strong.
So let us keep the way together,
And faithful be,
Through all life's fitful, changeful weather,
Till, fair and free,
Behind us lies the path love-lighted
For other feet,
Through heart-wounds healed, through dark wrongs righted
Through kindness sweet.
So short the journey is to heaven—
Let's make it bright
For every fellow traveler ever
Spread joy's clear light.

Convict No. 66

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

THE day was drawing to a close, but no crimson rays from the setting sun came into the cell of Convict No. 66. For the cell was under ground, and the light was the same all day; that gloomy twilight which makes the sentimental weep and think of home.

Convict No. 66 did not weep and he did not think of home—he had none. Moreover, he was not sentimental. He had had all that knocked out of him long ago. Still, he occasionally allowed himself to think. He did now.

Here he was in the prison; he had been there for many years, and would stay there until death should cut his chains. It would not be long now, for his eyes were growing dim and his hair was white.

He remembered the happy childhood when he had played with his little brother and the Girl. She had been a mighty pretty little girl, with long curls and big blue eyes. He had gone to the inevitable little red schoolhouse, also with the Girl, and had said his lesson, and failed, and been whipped. And then in the evening when he told mother all about it, she had rocked him and had sung his song to him:

Backward, turn backward, O Time, in your flight.

And then the night when he had told the Girl how much he loved her, and she . . .

Then his mother had died, and he, in the confidence of his youth, had gone to the city to win a fortune.

He had done well, very well, until he met a man who seemed to be his friend. He had a drink with this friend, then another, and another. A tough had swaggered into the saloon and called him "country." Urged on by the friend that he trusted, and being mad with the fire in his brain, he seized a knife from the bar and lunged at the man again and again with all his strength.

Convict No. 66 sighed. How clearly he remembered it all! Oh, so clearly! The trial in which he had given an assumed name, for the Girl must never know; the sentence for life; the long, long years.

A voice in the next cell began to sing. Convict No. 66 listened. It was the new boy, homesick. He sang:

Backward, turn backward, O Time, in your flight;
Make me a child again just for to-night.
Mother, come back—

The boyish voice stopped in mid-air with a sob, but Convict No. 66 did not hear. His head had fallen upon his breast, and the cell was very still.

Dr. Doggett Receiving the Key of Pratt Field From Mr. H. L. Pratt

A Commencement Procession Leaving the Administration Building

THE NEW IDEA IN Y. M. C. A. WORK

BY LAWRENCE L. DOGGETT, Ph.D.

IN THIS twentieth century we expect to read in every morning paper of new inventions and new methods of meeting the wants of society. Among these new professions one has become pretty clearly outlined, although it still lacks a comprehensive name. It is the profession of "friend of young men and boys." To this profession belong the officers of Young Men's Christian Associations, physical directors of high schools and colleges, managers of playgrounds and boys' clubs, and a variety of workers for social, physical, and moral betterment. This is a specialization of the ministry, just as surgery is a specialization of the art of healing. This ministry is also practical and in vital touch with modern life. Here is a life career of the highest usefulness for able men of Christian devotion and aptness for leadership, if only they have the requisite social and religious training.

In order to supply such training a unique institution has sprung up during the last twenty-five years at Springfield, Mass., under the name of the International Young Men's Christian Association College. This school already has 450 trained alumni in fifteen different countries in all parts of the world. More than two hundred and fifty of these alumni are officers in the Young Men's Christian Association, while nearly two hundred are in other lines of social, physical and religious service. Its graduates are in Paris, St. Petersburg, and Constantinople, in Calcutta, Hong Kong, Seoul, and Tokyo, in Australia, South America, and South Africa. Four are on the Canal Zone administering Young Men's Christian Associations among the workmen who are building the Panama Canal.

One of the largest services of this school is in Christian physical education. Here a thorough, scientific, and practical training is being given to an increasing corps of men who will practically serve as medical missionaries to the youth of our land, standing for preventive medicine and the maintenance of normal physical life and power. There is danger of actual degeneracy of the race under the strain of modern city life, and the Christian physical director in our schools and colleges, with his scientific knowledge of hygiene, his love for young men and his appreciation of manly character, is one of the great discoveries in modern Christian work.

The school at Springfield has created a new type of physical director, not the professional trainer who seeks to turn out a winning team, but a physical educator who realizes the physical basis of character and that the physical is the best approach to the boy and young man. Physical training, especially with the higher uses of athletics, is about the only means at our command in the modern city to serve as a substitute for the military training which young men receive abroad, and it is far better for the purpose of developing initiative and the rugged elements of character.

There are now 380,000 students in our high schools, 120,000 boys in private schools, and over 200,000 young men in colleges. There are also 600,000 members in Young Men's Christian Associations. The furnishing of physical directors for this vast body of young men who will soon be the leaders on this continent is a most important Christian service. The teacher of hygiene and all forms of Christian physical education comes nearer to the students under his direction than any other member of a school faculty. He has an opportunity for molding personality and directing the lives of young men hardly equaled by that of a pastor or a missionary.

The modern city has become the dominant type of life in this century. This is true not only here but in all the industrial countries of the world. It is in the city that we find the largest number of young men. They are the controlling element in our city life. Already Young Men's Christian Associations have been organized in most of the important cities throughout the world. The secretaries and other officers of an Association have an unusual opportunity for Christian work.

Bible, church history, and religious education the fundamental elements in its course of study. It is also important that an officer in the Young Men's Christian Association should understand the community problems of the present day. In sociology, social ethics, municipal sociology and community hygiene the most careful attention is given toward preparing men to deal with these perplexing problems. There are some four thousand officers in the Young Men's Christian Association alone. They are the chief agents in administering a property valued at over seventy million dollars.

Nearly four hundred experienced men are now giving their entire time to this form of effort. There are about one hundred and thirty boys' clubs, either independent or connected with churches, which employ directors of Christian work—social, religious, or physical. From twelve to seventeen years is an age of the greatest importance. It is plain that this is the period for moral and spiritual awakening. If the men of this country are to be saved for the kingdom of God, it must be during the teens. Workers for adults may lead Christians into service, but it is the director for work among boys who molds character.

The International Young Men's Christian Association College at Springfield has 220 students who are taking a three years' course of study, preparing themselves for these varied forms of specialized service. The basis for admission to this school is analogous to the requirements for the Rhodes scholarships. All students must pass a physical examination. They must have sterling Christian character. They must have leadership and must already have shown ability in the lines of service for which they wish to prepare. They must also have fulfilled the ordinary scholarly requirements for entering college. This gives a picked body of students, above the average in vitality, character and leadership.

The faculty receive calls for between four and five times as many graduates as the college is able to produce. There are forty-three young men in this year's graduating class. Just as the medical schools have clinics and hospitals for practical work, so the college at Springfield has a large system of normal work carried on by its students under the supervision of members of the faculty. The Sunday School Athletic League of Springfield, embracing over twenty different Sunday schools and enrolling six hundred boys, is under the direction of the students. The Bible study work on Sunday and the athletic games on week days are conducted by young men from the college. A large meeting for boys each Sunday afternoon is also carried on by the students during the winter months. More than a thousand boys and young men from Springfield come to the college for athletic exercise, instruction in hygiene and other purposes.

While great endowments and large sums for buildings and laboratories have been given in recent years for general education, the needs of institutions for religious education have not been met so liberally.

The college at Springfield is now seeking to secure a fund for endowment and expansion.

This institution is a real school for manhood. Its curriculum is based on the study of man—spiritually, socially, economically, intellectually and physically. The courses in methods seek to train its students to win men to a Christian life of devotion and service.

PANAMA'S FUTURE GARRISON

IT IS STATED in a recent despatch from Washington, D. C., to one of the great New York daily newspapers that Colonel Goethals, the chief builder of the Panama Canal, told the House Committee on Naval Affairs on January 19 that a garrison of 25,000 men will be necessary to guard the completed canal. Under present arrangements Congress would provide for a garrison of only 8,000 men. "Once we lost control of the sea in a war," Colonel Goethals said, "we would have to depend upon the garrison in the Zone. We could not expect to get reinforcements there from the United States. The locks, the vital portion of the canal, should be guarded by a large force, and the Atlantic and Pacific ends of the canal should be garrisoned. At least twenty-five thousand men would be needed to properly guard the canal." Colonel Goethals lauded the work done by the marines in the Canal Zone and urged the retention of a considerable force of them there.

RUSHING THE RELIEF WORK IN MACEDONIA

PEACE between the Balkan Allies and Turkey is at last assured. On January 22 the Turkish National Assembly accepted the advice of the government ministers and yielded to the pressure exerted by the combined Powers. Turkey will surrender Adrianople and the Islands of the Ægean Sea, though it is still believed she will contest the Allies' claim to a $200,000,000 war indemnity.

WITH the prospect of lasting peace daily growing brighter, the relief work in Macedonia is assuming more and more the form of assistance to the homeless thousands to get resettled. The need of actual food is still intense, and is being met as adequately as possible by the relief workers. Pastor Furnajieff, the chairman of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Relief Committee, writes of the distribution of the funds and the work among the Mohammedans. His last letter says:

"Our journey of eighteen days among the burnt and sacked villages revealed to us a more appalling need of relief than even we had imagined. Statistics often speak volumes, but personal investigation brings the situation much more closely to one's view. We saw parents in heartbreaking despair over an only child which had been killed or lost, or was known to have been carried away. One woman, who is unusually well provided for, came to us with such a story of her only daughter, a girl ten years old, saying, 'If you can find her and return her to me, take and divide between yourselves or use as you will the fifty pounds I have here with me. I will die unless I have her safely back again with me.'

"We saw families and groups of families that never expect the father back again, so they are deprived of all care and support. Villages where eighty-five out of every hundred houses have been reduced to ashes and where every vestige of food has been swept away were of everyday occurrence. Everywhere we found abject poverty where just before the war the people lived in plenty. We found whole villages where the population had nothing but the scant clothing they were wearing.

"Yesterday we were received at a rather lengthy audience by Her Majesty Queen Eleanor. Her attitude is that of the deepest sympathy for all the unfortunate victims of the war and especially for the orphans. In spite of her high position she shuns notoriety, and is allowing all the credit of her labors to go to others. In the course of the audience she spoke in the very highest terms of commendation of the philanthropy of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S readers and subscribers. She concluded the interview by saying: 'I am very deeply interested in the orphan work that is before us. We shall need the kindly co-operation of all good friends of the unfortunate on behalf of the thousands of orphaned children. The work will be an immense one, but a blessed one, as the Master himself has said.'

"The distribution of relief so far has been mainly in the form of food. The entire committee was agreed that this was the wisest plan for the present. Towards spring we may attempt to distribute some seed to the farming village population. In fact, some of the villagers have already begged us to promise seed for planting as soon as the ground is fit. Should this plan be followed, the committee will purchase seed wheat, maize, and beans for this purpose.

"I want to pass to all the good friends of this noble cause the assurance that their wishes are being carried out as exactly and as faithfully as it is within our power to do so. I know it would rejoice the hearts of many if they could realize the effect that this work is having among the Mohammedans. A short time ago, when distributing to Mohammedan poor, especially to women and children, I explained who it is that sends these provisions and what is the motive that actuates them. This opened the door for the story of the Master and his words, 'As ye have done it unto one of the least of these.'

"Many of the Pomaks, whose forefathers were Christians and were turned to Islam at the point of the sword, are now coming back to Christianity. They have been zealous, though utterly ignorant, followers of Mohammed, and it is more than likely that they are allying themselves with Christianity mainly for convenience' sake. They see no hope for Mohammedanism under the conditions of modern civilization and have taken this step without realizing its meaning. The only feature which recommends it is that now we shall have the chance to really place Christianity before them in a way that has never been possible before."

Pastor Furnajieff Distributing Christian Herald Relief to Needy Turkish Women

Besides such letters as the above, there is little news from the theater of war. Unconfirmed and unsubstantiated daily press reports have recently accused the Greeks and Servians of unworthy conduct in their newly occupied territories. Reports similar to this were rife early in the struggle about the Bulgarians. On another page of this issue conclusive evidence is given that these reports were fabrications circulated to discredit Bulgaria, and there seems every reason to believe that these later calumnies will be equally effectively disproved.

What's the Matter With Evangelism?

IT WOULD seem that the fusillade recently begun against some questionable methods of modern evangelism has been heard pretty nearly around the world. Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman, who has heard its echoes in Australia, writes a timely letter which we publish in another part of this issue. As he is admittedly the leading evangelist since Moody's day, his views deserve more than passing attention. Dr. Chapman makes three very strong points in his arraignment of modern evangelism. They can be stated concisely in a few words: commercialism, which unfortunately has become all too common with many evangelists; sensationalism, which is even more frequent than commercialism; and vulgarity, which, fortunately, is chargeable against only a few. He gives some excellent advice to the evangelists that is the fruit of wide experience and long service in the work of soul-winning.

Some of the recent criticisms of evangelists have been not only unjust but ill-founded. As a class, they are sincere and efficient, men of high spirituality and with a special call to itinerant Gospel work. There are many churches which would continue in a state of spiritual stagnation were it not for the deep-plowing and up-stirring work of the evangelists. But it is useless to deny that there are workers whose methods are censurable and who are not in intelligent accord with the spiritual needs of the times. Evangelism of the belligerent sort, that expends itself in vituperation or in attacks on church methods, does little good and frequently much harm. Faithful presentation of the Gospel and firm, earnest, gracious persuasiveness that excludes all sensationalism and rancor, are characteristics of the true evangelist. Such workers strengthen the churches, arouse the communities, and are always welcome. Their converts abide and become workers in their turn. The time has come when the evangelists, if they mean to retain their high position and the confidence of the churches everywhere, must modify their methods and focus all energies on the presentation of the Gospel message. We would be glad to hear from the evangelists themselves, after they have read carefully Dr. Chapman's letter.

The Defense of the Canal

WHILE the country was prepared for the announcement that it might become a part of our duty to assume the responsibility for protecting and, if necessary, defending the Panama Canal, the proposition now made by the canal authorities for a force of 25,000 troops for the purpose is a surprising one. This figure represents almost one-half of what was the total strength, a few years ago, of our entire army. It would seem that a very much smaller force should be adequate for the new need. To make the canal bristle with armaments and to entail upon the nation the cost of maintaining such a force there in times of peace is a proposition which will hardly meet with popular approval. Geographically, the situation of the canal is such that a reasonable military force stationed there could be very speedily reinforced in an emergency. Our near neighbors are friendly, and the long ocean distances render an armed surprise from other lands practically impossible. Besides, we are at peace with all the world, and the proposition to station a large army along the canal would seem to be preposterous. From the present outlook, an "army" is not needed there, and such a proceeding would simply be to invite the hostile attitude of those who now entertain the friendliest relations toward this government.

Rome Again in Politics

IT HAS been repeatedly urged by the Roman Catholic press and from Catholic pulpits that there is no foundation for the assertion that the Roman Church is actively interested in politics. We have seen, in the late election, enough evidence to the contrary to convince any sane person that the Papacy is by no means a quiescent factor in public affairs. Now it is again raising the issue by its urgent demands that there should be a Roman Catholic member in President Wilson's cabinet. It is the same old claim in the same familiar form, viz.: that the appointee should be chosen with a view to giving representation to Catholic interests. Nothing could be more directly antagonistic to the spirit of our American government. According to all precedents, the President-elect's cabinet is chosen wholly irrespective of the religious views of its members, and having regard exclusively to their availability as sound, able, competent citizens, qualified to render efficient service to the country. Nobody is urging the President-elect to draw the line at any religion; why then should he be importuned to appoint any man because of his religion, or in order to give any religious body, Catholic or Protestant or Jewish, undue preference irrespective of the essential requirements? We believe President Wilson is too sagacious, broad-minded and conservative to make even a single appointment solely to win favor with any body of religionists. Let his choice rest where it may, it will doubtless be made on proper grounds and not to appease the clamor of those Catholic journals that are foolishly holding out the bait of religious support in return for religious recognition. Governor Wilson is a Presbyterian, but he will not be a Presbyterian President, making capital for his own church, but an Executive representing the whole people. He will do well to ignore such foolish demands; to yield would be a serious blunder at the outset of his administration.

Miss Gould's Wedding Guests

PROBABLY no woman of our day has ever held a warmer place in the respect and affections of the American people than Miss Helen Gould, whose marriage to Mr. Finley J. Shepard was celebrated on January 22. She has dignified womanhood by her noble philanthropy and by the manner in which she has ordered her busy life. Some years ago, Miss Gould, in a letter to this journal, expressed the conviction that individual wealth was a trusteeship to be wisely used. She has done well with her talent, neither squandering it on self-indulgence, as many do, nor keeping it in idleness. To multitudes she has been a living evangel of love and mercy. Our soldiers, sailors, working-girls, Christian associations, many benevolent institutions and thousands of the children of the poor rise up and call her blessed. And now the good wishes of the whole American people go out to her spontaneously, with their earnest prayers that she may be happy in her new state. Her wedding gift of a supper to a thousand of the poor fellows of the Bowery Mission and the Bread Line was a gracious and beautiful benefaction, and one which will not soon be forgotten. It is a reminder of that feast to which the Master himself directed that the poor and th unable to make recompense should be gathered where they might sit down as welcome guests, v hearts full of love and lips running over with and blessing.

An Instructive Column

OURS has been called the richest nation in world. It is not the possession of vast we but the use we make of it that is of the highest portance. Wealth is a trust, and the larger means the greater our responsibilities. How so of our national wealth is spent may be gathe from these figures, which are compiled from rec statistics:

Foreign Missions	$12,000,000
Chewing Gums	13,000,000
Patent Medicines	80,000,000
Millinery	90,000,000
Tea and Coffee	100,000,000
Confectionery	200,000,000
Religion (Churches, etc.)	250,000,000
Automobiles	500,000,000
Jewelry and Ornaments	800,000,000
Intoxicating Liquors	2,500,000,000

These are mainly outside of ordinary expen tures in home or business, which, of course, cann even be approximated. There are countless forr of pleasure, too—some innocent and others the r verse—which cannot be computed in figures. B the showing as it stands is one that may well gi rise to the question whether, as a nation, we a making the best uses of our opportunities. "If w command our wealth," wrote one of the old philos phers, "we are rich and free; if our wealth con mands us, we are poor indeed."

Love for Christ

KISS the Son," says the Psalmist, "lest he be ar gry, and ye perish from the way." There wa a kiss of hospitality, with which a Jewish hos would welcome his guests. Jesus made complain that Simon the Pharisee had not offered him thi kiss (Luke 7: 45). There was a kiss of friendship and Jesus was shocked when he received the kis from the hypocrite Judas, his traitor (Luke 22 48). There was a kiss of homage and worship The people of Ephraim kissed the calves which they had set up for adoration (Hosea 13: 2); and in the days of Ahab, the Israelites, with the exception of seven thousand, had kissed the idol Baal (I Kings 19: 18). God wants men to kiss the Son, that is, to worship him as the true God; to acknowledge him as their Lord and King; to attach themselves with sincerest affection to him, because he is their best and greatest friend. God wants men to kiss the Son, as the woman in the Gospel kissed his feet, with deep sorrow over their waywardness, and pleading to be restored to his favor. God wants men to kiss the Son, because he is to be at all times a welcome guest to them; his unseen presence is to subdue their vain thoughts and desires in days of prosperity, and raise their drooping spirits in days of adversity. We find the Son in the promises of the Gospel and in every Gospel ordinance, such as baptism and holy communion. He says to us: "I have loved thee with an everlasting love. Thou art mine. Behold, I have graven thee upon the palms of my hands. Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends." We kiss the Son when our heart confidently embraces these gracious assurances, and when we raise the loyal shout of faithful allegiance to Jesus: "Thou art mine, O Christ, my Saviour. I am thine. Nothing shall sever me from thee." It is necessary to kiss the Son now, before he comes to judge the world. Those who have treated him with cold indifference here will not share his friendship hereafter. Those who have simulated friendship to him while casting him aside in their hearts, will not receive his greeting of welcome at the entrance to the bridal hall in glory. Remember Judas. Those who disdain his grace to sinners will hear his terrible reproof at the end. Remember Simon. But those who are crushed by the consciousness of their manifold guilt need not shrink from him.

O Lord, I worship thy boundless mercy which insures even to the vilest sinner not only penitent access to thee but also the embrace and kiss which the prodigal received at his return to his father's home. Thy grace has wooed and won my wayward heart. I cling to thee, my heavenly Liege. Keep my heart well-affectioned toward thee, despite all temptations to truancy and treachery. I ask it for the sake of thy blessed name. Amen.

Poincaré Elected French President

ON THE 17th of January, Nicholas Landry Raymond Poincaré was elected to succeed Armand Fallières as president of France for a term of seven years. The election as held in the palace at Versailles in what is aimed to be the most beautiful hall in Europe. It as decorated exquisitely with vases, tapestries, c., by the Minister of Fine Arts. Amidst the ildest excitement the members of the National ssembly, composed of the Senate and Chamber of eputies, cast their ballots for candidates for the residency Raymond Poincaré received 483 votes; ules Pams, a millionaire cigarette paper manufacrer, who resigned as Minister of Agriculture the ay of the election, got 296 votes, and Marie douard Vaillant received 69 votes. Poincaré is a ecoming figure in the line of uncrowned kings of rance, which includes Thiers, MacMahon, Grévy, arnot, Casimir-Périer, Faure, Loubet, and Falères. The new president has been an able and uccessful premier since January 14, 1912. Poincaré s physically a small man, bout five feet high, with ray eyes sometimes cold, enerally keen and very brilliant. He is modest, unasuming, quick in judgment, eady to face difficulty with n open mind. Behind this imple exterior there is seen nd felt the presence of a naster mind. He is a man of ncorruptible integrity. His olitical enemies do not asail his personal honesty. He s a literary man of rank. His pen is one of the most otential agents in French olitics. He is counted one f the most brilliant orators n Europe. When he took the primacy of the realm a year go he made a great financial sacrifice, giving up a law practice said to be worth $80,000 for $8,000 as a cabinet minister. His salary as president will be $240,000, but his expenses will be very heavy, and he will be debarred from going back to his law practice. Poincaré has been called to the head of the nation in an important period, and one fortunate for the country and for him. There is at this time in France a revival of intelligence, patriotism and religion. The strong, great, new leader has by his ability and loyal service been a factor in arousing and promoting this awakening, and there is a general expectation at home and abroad that his administration will help the nation up to the highest standard of individual and public morality and prosperity. The prophet and the tribes gathered together to select the head of the nation when God had chosen.

The Retiring President of France, M. Fallières (lifting his hat), and the New President, M. Poincaré (seated beside him)

And Samuel said to all the people, See ye him whom the Lord hath ehosen, that there is none like him among all the people? And all the people shouted, and said, God save the king. (I Sam. 10: 24.)

Ten-Ton Meteor Falls

A METEOR weighing about ten tons fell to the earth in the Alleghany Valley near Etna, Pa., the other night. The falling body came hissing hot, lighting up the territory for three miles about, and with an explosive sound striking the earth. It seemed largely of metallic formation, with a little lava connected with it. There was an odor of gas in the neighborhood. Those who saw it fall said it had a comet-like appearance. The curiosity was visited by people from many miles around. Many meteors have been found after they have fallen, but very few have ever been seen in the act of falling, as the one at Etna was. The largest known meteor now is at the Museum of Natural History in New York. It was brought to this country by Commander Robert E. Peary from the Far North. The meteor in the park weighs ninety tons. There has been wide difference of opinion as to the origin of meteors; but scientists now regard them as mere fragments of the innumerable interplanetary bodies which, thrown from their orbits, enter the earth's sphere of attraction and are drawn to its surface, becoming white hot and luminous as they pass through the atmosphere. A meteor is a symbol of one in the secular or religious world who, from a lofty altitude, suddenly becomes dislodged, moves out of his orbit, and falls like lead to the earth. The prophet saw those who by wisdom and spiritual service for others should stay secure in their exalted and luminous positions as fixed stars, even beyond the lifetime of the stars:

They that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars forever and ever. (Dan. 12: 3.)

A Bible University

MRS. EMMA S. KENNEDY, widow of John S. Kennedy, the banker, gave $100,000 recently to the Bible Teachers' Training School in New York City. The Rev. Dr. Wibert W. White, president of the institution, has plans for its expansion into a Bible university, and says that Mrs. Kennedy's generous gift will greatly promote those plans. The proposed Bible university contemplates schools of theology, religious pedagogy, missions, and Bible history; a Young Men's Christian Association, evangelists, sacred music, Sunday school superintendents, and deaconesses. At present there are 177 students, representing twenty countries. The splendid building in which the school is housed was the gift of Miss Helen Gould. The rich men of America have given with great generosity to the cause of education and philanthropy, but have not been so liberal with purely religious institutions, such as missions, home and foreign, the care of disabled and aged ministers, etc. Mr. Kennedy, who left $35,000,000 to charity, gave most of it for the church and purely religious purposes, and did it, as he indicated in his will, in gratitude to God, who had prospered him. This money of his widow, given to aid in the establishment of a Bible university, is in keeping with the personal loyalty to Christ and his church which her husband manifested in his benefactions. The new Bible university would be a perpetual obedience to Christ's commands:

Search the Scriptures, for in them ye think ye have eternal life; and they are they which testify of me. (John 5: 39.)

Flies Cause Infantile Paralysis

THE stable fly is charged with carrying infantile paralysis. The special indictment is brought by the Massachusetts Board of Health and by the Harvard University. The Harvard Alumni Bulletin gives the steps that lead the scientific investigators to the door of the stable fly. In the first place they took separated cases of paralysis among children and tried to find what insect would be likely to carry the disease to others. They found the strongest likelihood that it was this fly. The next step taken was to find whether this insect could carry the disease. They discovered that it could. The article says: "Monkeys were first infected with the disease by injection, and then allowed to be bitten by stable flies. After the necessary intervals these flies were allowed to bite other monkeys, and in six cases out of twelve the symptoms of the disease were exhibited. With these facts obtained at the Harvard Medical College, the surgeons of the Public Health and Marine Hospital Service at Washington repeated the experiment and proved that the disease which developed in monkeys bitten by infected stable flies was infantile paralysis by injecting another set of monkeys with a culture from the monkeys bitten by the flies. Thus the proof that the fly carries the virus of the disease is complete." This discovery is of untold interest, as the slaughter of the innocents is so appalling, and as a knowledge of the new danger will enable the physicians and the families to guard against it. The modern dangers of the fly remind us of the damage of these pests in olden time.

He sent divers sorts of flies among them, which devoured them. (Ps. 78: 45.)

Expensive Blunder

ON ACCOUNT of an error in the printing, the Post Office Department at Washington destroyed more than twenty million two-cent stamps of the Panama Exposition series. All the stamps bore the inscription, "Gatun Locks," but the beautiful view set forth represented San Pedro Miguel. The department, not wishing to subject itself to criticism, ordered the entire issue destroyed. The error on the die will be corrected, new plates made, and a fresh supply printed. The new issue will bear the inscription, "Panama Canal." Never in the history of the government has so vast a quantity of unused stamps of a single type been destroyed. Besides the expense of the error, it occasioned great inconvenience. The one-, five-, and ten-cent stamps commemorating the exposition in San Francisco were placed on sale on January 1, but the set is yet incomplete because of the mistake in printing the two-cent ones. What incalculable damage a single blunder sometimes causes in its effect on fortune or fame, on the standing or influence of a person in the secular or spiritual world! Fortunately the ordinary faults and unintentional errors of life can be easily corrected without too great damage. Circumspection and watchfulness are necessary to avoid the faults that would work injury to self and others. Singular freedom from error was found in the one thus described:

But they could find none occasion nor fault; forasmuch as he was faithful, neither was there any error or fault found in him. (Dan. 6: 4.)

Bachelors Prey of Swindler

A MARRIED woman of Iowa, professing to be single, handsome, and wealthy, put an offer of marriage in the paper as an advertisement. The unmarried men from Maine to San Francisco by hundreds answered her advertisement, desiring to accept her hand, and she engaged herself to them by the scores. By a clever fraud she got money from many of the suitors, and she has been cited to the Federal Grand Jury for trial for using the mails for swindling. So many in forming matrimonial alliances risk the chance of disappointment by looking for ease in fortune and fame, instead of love and respect as the basis of true marriage.

But they that will be rich fall into temptation and a snare. (I Tim. 6: 9.)

THE CALL OF ABRAM*

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

ADAM, Noah, Abram—these three men are the representatives of eras in the history of the world, particularly in the history of mankind. Abram was the tenth generation from Noah (taking the Bible genealogical lists as complete). He was of the line of Shem, the eldest son of Noah. Noah had three sons, Shem, Ham and Japheth, and from them the various races are descended. Abram was in the direct line from Shem. Abram was born in no mean city, but in "Ur, a great maritime emporium on the Persian Gulf, a walled city with a high civilization and a large commerce, situated in a marvelously rich country, said to be the original home of the wheat plant, and famous for its dates and other fruits." Ur was the capital city of the Chaldeans. It was entirely given over to idolatry, there being twelve or fifteen gods of equal dignity and authority, and a cloud of lesser deities.

The pick and the shovel in the hands of excavators have done much to make Abraham real to those who live in this age. In 1853 Mr. Taylor was the British consul at Busrah. He was interested to explore southern Babylonia, and came upon extensive ruins called Mugheir, or pitch, by the Arabs. While searching among these ruins, Mr. Taylor found numerous bricks stamped with inscriptions in the wedge-shaped characters of ancient Babylonia, bearing the name of Urgur, who called himself the king of Ur. Mr. Taylor had discovered Ur of the Chaldees, the birthplace of Abraham. Professor Edgar J. Banks, the noted archeologist, said, when excavating the same ruins: "One may now walk in the same streets in which Abraham used to play, and may climb the steps of the great temple which, when a boy, he mounted to gaze far out upon the horizon beyond which he later led his people. As one digs into the ruins, every bit of pottery, every brick, and the inscriptions help us to understand his age better."

Why should God say to Abram, "Get thee out of thy country and from thy kindred"? Was Abram free from the sin of idolatry? The Bible does not tell us so, but we must infer that he was not an idolater, or God would not have chosen him to become the father of his chosen people. The Book of Jubilees, which contains traditions concerning Abram, tells how when he was a boy Abram was filled with loathing for the vices which he saw in the people around him, and that he refused to worship idols. One day he entered a temple and destroyed seventy-two costly idols; for this he was thrown into a fire, and the flames were extinguished by a fountain which sprang up from beneath. Whatever may have been the quality of resistance which Abram showed toward idolatry in his native city, God knew his man when he chose that he should go forth into the land of Canaan.

The great Arabian Desert lay between Ur and Canaan, and so Abram must needs take a longer way around, through the Valley of the Euphrates, and along the northern border of the desert to Haran, and from Haran to Canaan his way was through the beautiful land of Syria. This route added at least three hundred miles to Abram's journey. He made a long halt of five years at Haran. We are not told why he did this, only it is said he was there until the death of his father Terah. Then Abram did not leave Ur alone? No, he was accompanied by his father Terah, who was two hundred years of age, Abram, at that time, being seventy-five years old. His nephew Lot also accompanied him, and Abram's wife Sarai and all their cattle, the substance that they had gathered, and all of the servants born in his house, probably three hundred and more, so that there was a great caravan. Evidently Terah was too feeble to journey beyond Haran, and when his death occurred Abram continued his journey to Canaan. And when he arrived, God gave him his title deed in the words: "Unto thy seed will I give this land." This was received by Abram as he stood beside the altar of stones which he had set up, and upon which he had laid a lamb as a sacrifice to God. The whole land was his, and he had only to choose in which part he would dwell. We are not therefore to suppose that Canaan was a vast uninhabited wilderness, for already some people were there, but they were not godly people, and they must be dispossessed of their squatter sovereignty. But the time had not come for this, and Abram journeyed on toward the southeast, when he came to Bethel, and there he halted his caravan, and again built an altar and offered a sacrifice to God, and afterward he still journeyed farther south. It was with him a question of grass for his flocks and herds and those of Lot. But everywhere he went he felt the presence of God.

There came a time when another syllable was added to Abram's name, added by God himself, and he was henceforth called "Abraham," which mea "father of a multitude" (Gen. 15, 5, 6, also Gen. 1 1-8.) How wondrously this has been fulfilled, sin among those who call themselves the children Abraham are 480,000,000 Christians, 180,000,0 Mohammedans, and 8,000,000 Jews, and their nu ber is constantly increasing. Pilgrims belongi to these people of different faiths journey to H bron that they may visit the tomb of Abraham as sacred shrine. The Mohammedans have, howev erected a massive mosque over it, which Christia may not enter.

When the Jews claimed to be the only childr of Abraham, the apostle Paul said to them: "Th are not all Israel, which are of Israel" (Rom. 9: 6 Also he said: "Abraham believed God, and it w counted to him for righteousness. Know therefo that they that are of faith, the same are the so of Abraham" (Gal. 3: 6, 7). Abraham is "the fath of all them that believe." "The promise was not Abraham or to his seed through the law, but throug the righteousness of faith." (Rom. 4: 11, 14).

What an inspiration was in those words as Go spoke them to Abram! "Get thee out of thy countr and from thy kindred." His noble soul was kindle by them. He was lifted out of the filthy miasma o idolatry and a clear horizon of great opportunit opened out before him. He was all the more read to enter upon the larger life because he had no neglected his duty to warn and rebuke the evil doers among whom he had grown up. It probably had never entered into the thought of Abram tha he was to be the pilgrim father of his people befor that day when God called him to "come out." Bu he was prepared to go forward because he had beer true to God. And so Columbus, on his little ship was sent by God to open up a new continent for the development of a Christian civilization. We seem to see him straining his eyes to catch the gleam of that small light moving along the shore, which indicated to him that land had been discovered. And since that day Columbus has been a blessing not only to the New World, but to the millions of people in the Old World who have come to these shores to find life, liberty and happiness, and who, finding these things, have found God.

There is a chance for each and all of us to "come out" and to be a blessing, you in your small corner, and I in mine. The difficulty is, we look far beyond our surroundings, and wish there was a great mission or a larger opportunity for us to show how useful and helpful we might be. We are too apt to look for a call that means a great uprooting of our lives and a transplanting to new fields, such as came to Abram, and disregard the call to the service near at hand. Let us begin with little deeds of kindness and little words of love to those we meet every day, and our horizon will soon enlarge. Let boys determine that they are going to make noble and useful men out of themselves. A boy fifteen years old was taken to view the Supreme Court in session on the occasion of his first visit to Washington. Coming out, his friend said, "Do you think you will ever be such a great man as those you have just seen?" He looked up hopefully and said in a cheery voice: "Well, they were all boys once, weren't they?"

Let girls take a noble woman like Frances E. Willard as their ideal, and God will surely call them to a life work which will give them their chance to serve him best and do best for humanity. Ever since the time of Abraham, nearly four thousand years ago, God has been seeking men and women to fill just such places, and he has found many, and even now there are many young lives that are being shaped to serve God's purpose. Sauls are being trained in the bosom of the Sanhedrin (Jews); Luthers in the cloisters of the Papal Church. God knows where to find them. "And when the times are darkest, there shall be led forth a host of pilgrim spirits, numberless as the sand on the seashore, and as the star dust lying thick through the illimitable expanse of space."—Dr. F. B. Meyer.

OUR SUNDAY SCHOOL SUPERINTENDENTS' ROUND TABLE

—MR. R. L. ALLEN, of Owensboro, Ky., writes the conductor of the Round Table Department as follows: "I found in my experience that the vital spot in Sunday school work is the teacher, and much depends upon the alertness of the superintendent as to the efficiency of the teaching force. He must make the plans for the school as a unit and see that they are carried out. I came to this conclusion that no school can work as a unit without a teacher's meeting. There the plans are laid and instruction given. Moreover, there should be in that teacher's meeting a number of supply teachers, who may be called upon the following Sunday to take the place of absent teachers. They are thus in touch with all that is going on and can prevent a break in the unity of the school's work. Of course there ought to be a teacher's training class, but they ought not to be called upon to teach until they have taken the course prescribed. This is not theory, but experience I am giving you. I am glad to give my answers to the questions which appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of January 22.

"1. Yes, when I was superintendent of the Third Baptist Sunday school at Queensboro, Ky., I practiced the device of simply holding up my right hand with forefinger extended, for order, then announced a song, then prayer, etc.

"2. An active enthusiastic leader, who let it be known that he expects every one to stay, can usually succeed. Plenty of books is essential, but a quiet, determined insistence that all sing is very essential.

"3. I cannot say it has.

"4. No.

"5. No.

"6. The best way I know is to prepare them for such by careful teaching by a devoted Christian teacher.

"7. Give them something to do—we learn to do by doing. Don't preach at them about what they 'ought' to do.

"8. The Sunday school ought not to be a 'Young People's Department'; it (the Sunday school) ought to be an all people's department of co-ordinate importance with the church service; whereas a 'Young People's Department' ought to be organized, officered and manned by young people. If the old folks are made too prominent in the latter, the young folks will drop out.

"9. The most universal and fatal fault is the lack of devoted, trained teachers. No trouble to 'get' the pupils, but the teacher must hold and instruct and inspire them, else the 'getting' is temporary and valueless.

"10. An alert superintendent with a trained body of devoted teachers, organized into a compact working unit, making one complete Sunday school—not as many schools as teachers all happening to meet under the same roof at the same hour."

AS THE days of waiting passed, one by one, it seemed, indeed, that Aunt Polly was doing everything (but that) that ıe could do to please her niece.

"I wouldn't ha' believed it; you ›uldn't ha' made me believe it!" ancy said to Old Tom one morning. There don't seem ter be a minute in ıe day that Miss Polly ain't jest ıngin' round waitin' ter do somethin' ›r that blessed lamb. An' the other ıy, if I didn't find her sittin' 'fore ıe bed with the nurse actually doin' ›r hair, an' Miss Pollyanna lookin' ı an' bossin' from the bed, her eyes l shinin' an' happy. An' I declare ›r goodness, if Miss Polly hain't wore ›r hair like that every day now—jest ›r please that blessed child!"

Old Tom chuckled.

"Well, it strikes me Miss Polly her-lf ain't lookin' none the worse for earin' them 'ere curls round her ›rehead," he observed dryly. Then bruptly the light died from his eyes. How is she ter-day—the little gal!"

Nancy shook her head. Her face, ›o, had sobered.

"Jest the same, Mr. Tom. There in't no special difference, as I can see -or anybody, I guess. She jest lays ıere an' sleeps an' talks some, an' ›ies ter smile an' be 'glad' 'cause the ın sets or the moon rises, or some ther such thing, till it's enough ter ıake yer heart break with achin'."

"I know; it's the 'game'—bless her weet heart!" nodded Old Tom.

"She told you, then, too, about that ›re game?"

"Oh, yes. She told me long ago." The old man hesitated, then went on, is lips twitching a little. "I was rowlin' one day 'cause I was so bent p and crooked; an' what do you sup-ose the little thing said? She said I ›uld be glad, anyhow, that I didn't ave ter stoop so far ter do my eedin', 'cause I was already bent art way over."

Nancy gave a wistful laugh.

"Well, I ain't surprised, after all. ou might know she'd find somethin'. We've been playin' it—that game—ince almost the first, 'cause there ›an't no one else she could play it ›ith," sighed Nancy, as she went back o her kitchen.

For no one were those days of wait-ng easy. The nurse tried to look heerful, but her eyes were troubled. The doctor was plainly nervous and mpatient. Miss Polly said little; but ven the softening waves of hair bout her face and the becoming laces t her throat could not hide the fact hat she was growing thin and pale.

As to Pollyanna: Pollyanna petted he dog, smoothed the cat's sleek head, dmired the flowers and ate the fruits nd jellies that were sent in to her, nd returned innumerable cheery an-swers to the many messages of love nd inquiry that were brought to her edside. But she, too, grew pale and hin; and the nervous activity of the ittle hands and arms only emphasized he pitiful motionlessness of the once ctive little feet and legs now so woe-fully quiet under the blankets.

As to the game: Pollyanna told Nancy these days how glad she was going to be when she could go to school again; go to see Mrs. Snow; go o call on Mr. Pendleton, and go to ride with Dr. Chilton; nor did she seem to realize that all this "glad-ness" was in the future, not the pres-ent. Nancy, however, did realize it—nd cry about it, when sh- was alone.

CHAPTER XXIII

A Door Ajar

JUST a week from the time Dr. Mead, the specialist, was first expected, h- came. He was a tall, broad-shouldered man with kind, gray eyes and a cheerful smile. Pollyanna liked him at once, and told him so.

"You look quite a lot like my doctor, you see," she added engagingly.

"Your doctor?" Dr. Mead glanced in evident surprise at Dr. Warren, talking with the nurse a few feet away. Dr. Warren was a small, brown-eyed man with a pointed brown beard.

"Oh, that isn't my doctor," smiled Pollyanna, divining his thought. "Dr. Warren is Aunt Polly's doctor. My doctor is Dr. Chilton."

"Oh!" said Dr. Mead, a little oddly, his eyes resting on Miss Polly, who, with a vivid blush, had walked hastily away. Then he turned a grave face toward Dr. Warren, who had just come to the bedside.

Every one said afterward that it was the cat that did it. Certainly, if Fluffy had not poked an insistent paw and nose against Pollyanna's unlatched door, the door would not have swung noiselessly open on its hinges until it stood perhaps a foot ajar; and if the door had not been open, Pollyanna would not have heard her aunt's words.

In the hall the two doctors, the nurse, and Miss Polly stood talking. In Pollyanna's room Fluffy had just jumped to the bed, when through the open door sounded clearly and sharply Aunt Polly's agonized exclamation.

"Not that! Doctor, not that! You don't mean the child will never walk again?"

It was all confusion then. First, from the bedroom came Pollyanna's terrified "Aunt Polly! Aunt Polly!" Then Miss Polly, seeing the open door and realizing that her words had been heard, gave a low little moan, and—for the first time in her life—fainted dead away.

The nurse, with a choking "She heard!" stumbled toward the open door.

In Pollyanna's room the nurse found a purring cat on the bed vainly trying to attract the attention of a white-faced, wild-eyed little girl.

"Miss Hunt, please, I want Aunt Polly. I want her right away; quick, please!"

The nurse closed the door and came forward hurriedly.

"She—she can't come just this minute, dear. She will—a little later. What is it? Can't I get it?"

Pollyanna shook her head.

"But I want to know what she said just now. Did you hear her? I want her to tell me 'tisn't true—'tisn't true!"

The nurse tried to speak, but no words came. Something in her face sent an added terror to Pollyanna's eyes.

"Miss Hunt, you did hear her. It is true! Oh, it isn't true! You don't mean I can't ever walk again?"

"There, there, dear! don't, don't!" choked the nurse. "Perhaps he didn't know. Perhaps he was mistaken. There's lots of things that could happen, you know."

"But Aunt Polly said he did know! She said he knew more than anybody else about—about broken legs like mine!"

"Yes, yes, I know, dear; but all doctors make mistakes sometimes. Just—just don't think any more about it now—please don't, dear!"

Pollyanna flung out her arms wildly.

"But I can't help thinking about it!" she sobbed. "It's all there is now to think about. Why, Miss Hunt, how am I going to school or to see Mr. Pendleton, or Mrs. Snow, or—or anybody?" She caught her breath and sobbed wildly for a moment. Suddenly she stopped and looked up, a new terror in her eyes. "Why, Miss Hunt, if I can't walk, how am I ever going to be glad for—anything?"

Miss Hunt did not know "the game"; but she did know that her patient must be quieted at once. In spite of her perturbation and of her heartache, her hands had not been idle, and she stood now at the bedside with the quieting powder ready.

"There, there, dear; just take this," she soothed; "and by and by we'll be more rested, and we'll see what can be done then. Things aren't half as bad as they seem, dear, lots of times, you know."

Obediently Pollyanna took the medicine and sipped the water from the glass in Miss Hunt's hand.

"I know; that sounds like things father used to say," faltered Pollyanna, blinking off the tears. "He said there was always something about everything that might be worse; but I reckon he'd never just heard he couldn't ever walk again. I don't see how there can be anything about that that could be worse, do you?"

Miss Hunt did not reply. She could not trust herself to speak just then.

CHAPTER XXIV

Two Visits

IT WAS Nancy who was sent to tell Mr. John Pendleton of Dr. Mead's verdict.

There had been a time when Nancy would have rejoiced greatly at this extraordinary opportunity to see something of the House of Mystery and its master. But to-day her heart was too heavy to rejoice at anything during the few minutes she waited for Mr. John Pendleton to appear.

"I'm Nancy, sir," she said respectfully, in response to the surprised questioning of his eyes when he came into the room. "Miss Harrington sent me to tell you about—Miss Pollyanna."

"Well?"

In spite of the curt terseness of the word, Nancy quite understood the anxiety that lay behind that short "well?"

"It ain't well, Mr. Pendleton," she choked.

"You don't mean—" He paused, and she bowed her head miserably.

"Yes, sir. He says she can't walk again—never."

For a moment there was absolute silence in the room; then the man spoke, in a voice shaken with emotion.

"Poor—little—girl! Poor—little—girl!"

Nancy glanced at him, but dropped her eyes at once. She had not supposed that sour, cross, stern John Pendleton could look like that. In a moment he spoke again, still in the low, unsteady voice.

"It seems cruel—never to dance in the sunshine again! My little prism girl!"

There was another silence; then, abruptly, the man asked:

"She herself doesn't know yet, of course?"

"But she does, sir," sobbed Nancy. "She found out—drat that cat! I begs yer pardon," apologized the girl, hurriedly. "It's only that the cat pushed open the door an' Miss Pollyanna overheard 'em talkin'. She found out—that way."

"Poor — little — girl!" sighed the man again.

"Yes, sir. You'd say so, sir, if you could see her," choked Nancy. "You see, it's all so fresh an' new to her, an' she keeps thinkin' all the time of new things she can't do now. It worries her, too, 'cause she can't seem ter be glad—maybe you don't know about her game, though," broke off Nancy, apologetically.

"The 'glad game'?" asked the man. "Oh, yes; she told me of that."

"Oh, she did? Well, I guess she has told it generally, ter most folks. But you see, now she—she can't play it herself, an' it worries her. She says she can't think of a thing—not a thing—ter be glad about."

"Well, why should she?" retorted the man, almost savagely.

Nancy shifted her position uneasily.

"That's the way I felt, too—till I happened ter think—it would be easier if she could find somethin', ye know. So I tried to—to remind her."

"To remind her! Of what?" John Pendleton's voice was still angrily impatient.

"Of—of how she told others ter play it—Mrs. Snow and the rest, ye know; and what she said for 'em ter do. But the poor lamb jest cries, an' says it don't seem the same, somehow. She says it's easy ter tell lifelong invalids how ter be glad, but 'tain't the same thing when you're the lifelong invalid yerself, an' have ter try ter do it. She says she's told herself over an' over again how glad she is that other folks ain't like her; but that all the time she's sayin' it, she ain't really thinkin' of anythin' only how she can't ever walk again."

Nancy paused, but the man did not speak. He sat with his hands over his eyes.

"Then I tried ter remind her how she used ter say the game was all the nicer ter play when—when it was hard," resumed Nancy, in a dull voice. "But she says that, too, is different—when it really is hard. An' I must be goin' now, sir," she broke off abruptly.

At the door she hesitated, turned and asked timidly:

'I couldn't be tellin' Miss Pollyanna that—that you'd seen Jimmy Bean again, I s'pose, sir, could I?"

"I don't see how you could—as I haven't seen him," observed the man a little shortly. "Why?"

"Nothin', sir, only—well, ye see, that's one of the things that she was feelin' bad about, that she couldn't take him ter see you, now. She said she'd taken him once, but she didn't think he showed off very well that day, and she was afraid you didn't think he would make a very nice child's presence, after all. Maybe you know what she means by that; but I didn't, sir."

"Yes, I know—what she means."

"All right, sir. It was only that she was wantin' ter take him again, she said, so's ter show you he really was a lovely child's presence. And now she can't—drat that autymobile! I begs yer pardon, sir. Good day!" And Nancy fled precipitately.

It did not take long for the entire town of Beldingsville to learn that the great New York doctor had said Pollyanna Whittier would never walk again; and certainly never before had the town been so stirred. Everybody knew by sight now the piquant little freckled face that had always a smile of greeting; and almost everybody knew of the "game" that Pollyanna was playing. To think that now never again would that smiling face be seen on their streets! It seemed unbelievable, impossible, cruel.

In kitchens and sitting-rooms and over backyard fences women talked of it, and wept openly. On street corners and in store lounging-places the men talked too, and wept—though not so openly. And neither the talking nor the weeping grew less when, fast on the heels of the news itself, came Nancy's pitiful story that Pollyanna, face to face with what was before her, was bemoaning most of all the fact that she could not play the game; that she could not now be glad over—anything.

It was then that the same thought must have, in some way, come to Pollyanna's friends. At all events, almost at once, the mistress of the Harrington homestead, greatly to her surprise, began to receive calls—calls from people she knew, and people she did not know; calls from men, women and children.

Some came in and sat down for a stiff five or ten minutes. Some stood awkwardly on the porch steps, fumbling with hats or handbags, according to their sex. Some brought a book, a bunch of flowers, or a dainty to tempt the palate. Some cried frankly. Some turned their backs and blew their noses furiously. But all inquired very anxiously for the little injured girl, and all sent to her some message. And it was these messages which, after a time, stirred Miss Polly to action.

First came Mr. John Pendleton. He was without his crutches to-day.

"I don't need to tell you how shocked I am," he began abruptly. "But can nothing be done?"

Miss Polly gave a gesture of despair.

"Oh, Dr. Mead prescribed certain treatments and medicines that might help, and Dr. Warren is carrying them out to the letter, of course. But Dr. Mead held out almost no hope."

John Pendleton rose abruptly—though he had but just come. His face was white, and his mouth was set into stern lines. At the door he turned.

"I have a message for Pollyanna," he said. "Will you tell her, please, that I have seen Jimmy Bean, and—and that he's going to be my boy hereafter. Tell her I thought she would be glad to know. I shall adopt him, probably."

For a brief instant Miss Polly lost her usual well-bred self-control.

"You will adopt Jimmy Bean?" she gasped.

The man lifted his chin a little.

"Yes. I think Pollyanna will understand. You will tell her I thought she would be—glad?"

"Why, of—of course," faltered Miss Polly.

"Thank you," bowed John Pendleton, as he turned to go.

In the middle of the floor Miss Polly stood, silent and amazed, still looking after the man who had just left her. Even yet she could scarcely believe what her ears had heard. John Pendleton adopt Jimmy Bean? John Pendleton, wealthy, independent, morose, reputed to be miserly and supremely selfish, to adopt a little boy! and such a little boy!

With a somewhat dazed face Miss Polly went upstairs to Pollyanna's room.

"Pollyanna, I have a message for you from Mr. John Pendleton. He has just been here. He says to tell you he has taken Jimmy Bean for his little boy. He said he thought you'd be glad to know it."

Pollyanna's wistful little face flamed into sudden joy.

"Glad? Glad? Well, I reckon I am glad! Oh, Aunt Polly, I've so wanted to find a place for Jimmy! And that's such a perfectly lovely place! Besides, I am so glad for Mr. Pendleton, too. You see, now he'll have the child's presence.'

"The—what?"

Pollyanna colored painfully. She had forgotten that she had never told her aunt of Mr. Pendleton's desire to adopt her; and certainly she would not wish to tell her now that she had ever thought for a minute of leaving her—this dear Aunt Polly!"

"The child's presence,' stammered Pollyanna, hastily. "Mr. Pendleton told me once, you see, that only a woman's hand and heart, or a child's presence, could make a—a home. And now he's got it—the child's presence."

"Oh, I—see," said Miss Polly very gently; and she did see—more than Pollyanna realized. She saw something of the pressure that was probably brought to bear on Pollyanna herself at the time John Pendleton was asking her to be the "child's presence" which was to transform his great pile

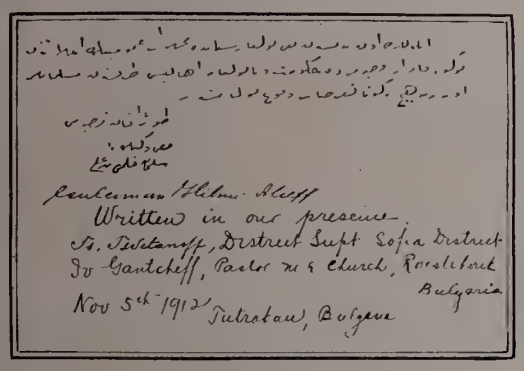
BALKAN DISCLAIMER

PASTOR IVAN GANTCHEFF, one of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S good friends in Bulgaria, has taken the trouble to make a trip t Tutrakan, where it was said a mas- re had been perpetrated by the garians. The quotation of a news- per despatch which contained this nouncement has brought many let- s of protest both from Bulgaria and rces nearer ne. We are d to give stor Gant- ff's author- tive contra- ction. His tter is in rt as fol- s:

Rustchuk, place where ive, is about rty miles om Tutra- n, and if re had been y such ughter, or lage, surely should have known something out it. Wishing, however, to find t whether there was any truth in s despatch, one of our district perintendents and I started for very spot where the massacre said to have occurred. A few urs later we were talking with Turkish religious representative— hodja. The official letter which he gave us, and which I enclose, speaks for itself that there is not a particle of truth in the despatch quoted. This official paper states that from the day of the mobilization of the Bulgarian army, September 30, till the day we were there, the Turkish inhabitants of Tutrakan have suffered no harm whatever, neither from the Bulgarians of that town, nor from troops of the government of Bulgaria.



Written in our presence.
St. Tsvetanoff, District Supt Sofia District
Jv Gantcheff, Pastor M E Church, Roustchuk

Nov 5th 1912 Tutrakan, Bulgaria

The Turkish Hodja's Letter

"Upon our entering in the largest Turkish coffee-house in the town, we found Turks and Bulgarians drinking their coffee and talking together. When we asked several of the prominent Turkish merchants and school-teachers whether there was any truth in the despatch, they laughed at us, and said that they have a great deal more freedom in Tutrakan than they would have had in Constantinople at the presnt time. The despatch sent to the London Daily Mail and quoted in your paper is from Roumania—a country which at the present time is in sympathy with the Turks."

stone into a home. "I see," she ished, her eyes dim with sudden ars.

Pollyanna, fearful that her aunt ght ask further embarrassing ques- ns, hastened to lead the conversa- n away from the Pendleton house d its master.

"Dr. Chilton says so, too—that it kes a woman's hand and heart, or a ild's presence, to make a home, you ow," she remarked.

Miss Polly turned with a start.

"Dr. Chilton! How do you know—at?"

"He told me so. 'Twas when he id he lived in just rooms, you know not a home."

Miss Polly did not answer. Her es were out the window.

"So I asked him why he didn't get m—a woman's hand and heart, and ve a home."

"Pollyanna!" Miss Polly had turned harply. Her cheeks were a vivid nk.

"Well, I did. He looked so—sorrowful."

"What did he—say?" Miss Polly asked the question as if in spite of some force within her that was urging her not to ask it.

"He didn't say anything for a minute; then he said very low that you couldn't always get 'em for the asking. He wants one, anyhow, I know, and I wish he could have one."

"Why, Pollyanna, how do you know?"

"Because, afterwards, on another day, he said something else. He said that low, too; but I heard him. He said that he'd give all the world if he did have one woman's hand and heart. Why, Aunt Polly, what's the matter?" Aunt Polly had risen hurriedly and gone to the window.

"Nothing, dear. I was changing the position of this prism," said Aunt Polly, whose whole face was now aflame.

AMONG THE WORKERS

—IN RESPONSE TO THE appeal which appeared THE CHRISTIAN HERALD some time ago, angelist Eastman of the Y. M. C. A. at San ancisco, Calif., writes that he has received ree dozen New Testaments, for which he artily desires to thank the donors.

—A UNIQUE FEATURE of the work carried on Evangelist Biederwolf is the emphasis aced in each of his campaigns on the social rvice side of the Gospel message. Out of Mr. iederwolf's experience in the Men and Reli- on Forward Movement came the idea of in- oducing into a regular evangelistic campaign me of the phases of religious work so rongly emphasized by this movement. Mr. iederwolf believes if there are any two hases of Christian work that ought to go and in hand they are evangelism and social rvice. In carrying out this idea, Dr. Lan- ng, the noted social service specialist from ew York City, worked with Dr. Biederwolf in he campaign of evangelism which closed in Hamilton, Ohio, December 16.

—DURING AN UNUSUALLY successful evan- elistic campaign in Williamsburg, Iowa, con- ucted by Dr. John H. Elliott and Mr. A. S. eitz, the most outstanding feature was the ay given to the pastors for their own work nd designated by the slogan "the whole hurch at work." Each pastor met his own eople that day in his own church, the entire ime being devoted to planning a practical method of work. The members present were given the names of irregular church attendants, of those interested through the special evangelistic meetings and others whom they hoped to interest. They purpose to extend and follow up this work until the entire membership is engaged in it and the whole community and countryside has been evangelized.

—THE PRISON ASSOCIATION of New York is doing a noble work for the younger and older delinquents of the State and for the families of men in prison. Its work includes care for first offenders who are discharged from court "on probation"; prison visiting, sending sympathetic agents to talk with prisoners, trying to win them to a better life and conferring with them about their problems and hopes; looking after prisoners discharged "on parole"; caring for the families of prisoners, trying to undo the disgrace and discouragement which accompanies the sentencing of husbands and fathers to prison terms; helping the discharged prisoner, who finds it so difficult to make a new start in the world and so easy to drift back to a life of crime; inspection of prisons; advice in construction of new prisons, an oversight of prison legislation, and many other practical phases of work connected with the prison system. The society is broadening its work and could protect and encourage many more unfortunates than at present if adequnte funds were in hand.

On Winter Nights

THE planning of your summer garden is one of the events of the winter and to many the making out of the annual order for Henderson's seeds is a real pleasure in which every one of the family takes a part.

Plan your summer's garden during the long winter nights thoroughly and carefully. One of the 1913 features of our Garden Guide and Record is several garden plans to fit various sized plots which have been laid out by our experts with a view to obtaining the greatest amount of efficiency. With the cultural directions and garden hints brought up to date, this book of 68 pages is probably, and deservingly so, one of the most popular and practical of our many publications.

Tested Seeds

To get the best results from your garden it is necessary to get the best seeds. Every packet of Henderson's seeds that is sold has behind it the accumulated experience of sixty-six years of successful seed growing and selling. Most of the accepted methods of seed testing and trials in use to-day originated with the founder of our firm and the methods that were the best three generations ago have been improved and bettered by us from year to year and are to-day still the best. The initial cost of the seeds is really the smallest cost of your garden and it pays to be sure you have started right.

"Everything for the Garden" is the title of our annual catalogue. It is a book of 212 pages, handsomely bound, with a beautifully embossed cover, 8 colored plates, and 800 illustrations, most of them half-tones, direct from photographs, showing actual results without exaggeration. It is a library of everything worth while, either in farm, or garden, or home, and with our Garden Guide and Record make two books that are invaluable to the gardener.

A REMARKABLE OFFER OF Henderson's Specialties

To demonstrate the superiority of Henderson's Tested Seeds. we have made up six of the best we have, into a Henderson Collection, consisting of one packet each of the following great specialties:

Ponderosa Tomato	Henderson's Invincible Asters
Big Boston Lettuce	Mammoth Butterfly Pansies
Scarlet Globe Radish	Giant Spencer Sweet Peas

To obtain for our annual catalogue, "Everything for the Garden," described above, the largest possible distribution, we make the following unusual offer: To everyone who will mail us 10c., we will mail our catalogue, our Garden Guide and Record, and also send our "Henderson Specialty Collection" as above.

DAILY MEDITATION
FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR
BY REV. J. H. JOWETT, D. D.

SUNDAY, February 9. Isaiah 54: 4-10. Where can we lay the foundations of our lives? "Change and decay in all around I see." We cannot build upon human strength, for this dwindles away like water in a leaking vessel.

We cannot rely upon friends, for calamity may render them impotent, or death may snatch them away from our eyes. But there is one thing that remains changeless amid all the changes of time, and that is the loving-kindness of our God. "The mountains shall depart, and the hills be removed; but my kindness shall not depart," saith the Lord Almighty.

But there are some things we cannot build upon the loving-kindness of the Lord. We cannot build unkindness upon it. That would be like building stubble upon a foundation of purest gold. It would be like seeking to fashion harmonies out of Christ and Belial. It would be a marriage of discords, and all the forces of creation are leagued against it. God's kindness is essentially holy, and only the "things that are pure" can be built upon it. Holy kindnesses can be raised upon that foundation as fittingly as radiant diamonds can be married to rarest gold. We can build upon the Lord everything that is congenial to his own nature, and so building the temple of our life will share the eternity of God. "Because I live ye shall live also."

MONDAY, February 10. Genesis 12: 1-9. "Get thee out . . . and I will show thee." "So Abram departed, . . . and the Lord appeared." We must bring these separated passages together if we would appreciate the graciousness of the Lord's call. They are like the two sides of the same shield. They answer each other as voice and echo. When I move in obedience the Lord moves in inspiration. He never lets me go on my own charges. "All things are now ready." Before he makes me to hunger the bread is prepared. Before I thirst the water is at hand. Before he calls me he has opened springs in difficult places and arbors of rest along the road. When Abram set out from his own country the Lord went before him.

And so I need not fear the arduous call. The very measure of its difficulty is also the measure of the riches of the divine provisions. "As thy day so shall thy strength be." At every turning of the winding way the Lord will appear unto us. At every new demand we shall discover new bounty, and everywhere in the unfamiliar road we shall gaze upon the familiar and friendly face of the Lord.

TUESDAY, February 11. Hebrews 11: 6-10. Abram began his journey without any knowledge of his ultimate destination. He obeyed a noble impulse without any discernment of its consequences. He took "one step," and he did not "ask to see the distant scene." And that is faith, to do God's will here and now, quietly leaving the results to him. Faith is not concerned with the entire chain; its devoted attention is fixed upon the immediate link. Faith is not knowledge of a moral process; it is fidelity in a moral act. Faith leaves something to the Lord: it obeys his immediate commandment and leaves to him direction and destiny.

And so faith is accompanied by serenity. "He that believeth shall not make haste," or more literally, "shall not get into a fuss." He shall not get into a panic. He shall not fetch fears either from his yesterdays or his to-morrows. Concerning his yesterdays, faith says, "Thou hast beset me behind." Concerning his to-morrows, faith says, "Thou hast beset me before." Concerning the immediate day, faith says, "Thou hast laid thine hand upon me." That is enough: just to feel the presence of the guiding hand.

WEDNESDAY, February 12. Acts 7: 1-7. "Unto a land that I will show thee." But what mysterious windings there often are before that land is reached! But God's windings are never wasteful and purposeless. The apparent deviations are always gracious preparations. We are taken "out of the way" in order that we may the more richly reach our end. George Pilkington yearned to go to the foreign field, and God sent him to a dairy-farm in Ireland. But the Irish dairy-farm proved to be on the way to Uganda; and all the experience and knowledge which Pilkington picked up in this strange business proved invaluable when he reached his appointed field. "He bringeth the blind by a way that they know not."

So I will remember that the "short cut" is not always the finest road. God's round-about ways are filled with heavenly treasure. Every winding is purposed for the discovery of new wealth. What riches we gather on the way to God's goal!

The hill of Zion yields
A thousand sacred sweets
Before we reach the heavenly fields,
Or walk the golden streets.

THURSDAY, February 13. Galatians 3: 6-14. Emerson says somewhere that he has noticed that men whose duties are performed beneath great domes acquire a stately and appropriate manner. The vergers in our great cathedrals have a dignified stride. It is not otherwise with men who consciously live under the power of vast relationships. Princes of royal blood have a certain great "air" about them. The consciousness of noble kinships has an expansive influence upon the soul. The Jews felt its influence when they called to mind "our Father Abraham."

So is it with men and women of glorious kinships in the realm of faith. Their souls expand in the vast and exalted relations. "The children of faith" have vital communion with all the spiritual princes and princesses of countless years. They have blood-relationship with the patriarchs, and psalmists, and prophets, and they dwell "in heavenly places" with Paul, and Augustine, and Luther, and Wesley.

Surely, such exalted kinship should influence our very stride, and set its mark upon our "daily walk and conversation." It ought to make us so big that we can never speak a mean word, or do a petty and peevish thing.

Diamond Dyes Saved Her Sui

"I knew you will be interested in my experience with Diamon Dyes.

"Last fall I was in a serious dilemma. I had bought a light brow suit, which soiled so easily that I determined to dye it a darker color I purchased a package of ——— dyes. The druggist had told me th would dye any kind of material, but as I had never dyed anythi before I thought it would be well to test it with a small piece of th cloth. This little precaution saved my suit. The sample came out o the dye so 'streaky' that I knew something must be wrong Fortunately just then a friend called to tell me that she had choose the color of her 'sweater suit'—a white sweater and a white serg skirt. She dyed the sweater gray and the shirt black.

"When I told her how unsuccessful I had been she said she knew what the difficulty was and told me to ask for Diamond Dyes fo Wool. I went at once to another drug store and this time I got a package of Black Diamond Dyes for Wool. To be absolutely sure though, I again tried a small sample first. The results reassured me, and I found that the suit could be dyed perfectly, with the proper dyes. My suit looks as new and fresh now as when I bought it, and the color is far more becoming."

Diamond Dyes

There are two classes of Diamond Dyes—one for Wool or Silk, the other for Cotton, Linen, or Mixed Goods. Diamond Dyes for Wool or Silk come in Blue envelopes. Diamond Dyes for for Cotton, Linen, or Mixed Goods come in White envelopes.

Here's the Truth About Dyes for Home Use

One experience of over thirty years has proven that no one dye will successfully color every fabric.

There are two classes of fabrics, animal fibre fabrics, and vegetable fibre fabrics.

Wool and Silk are animal fibre fabrics. Cotton and Linen are vegetable fibre fabrics. "Union" or "Mixed" goods are 60% to 80% Cotton—so must be treated as vegetable fibre fabrics.

Vegetable fibres require one class of dye, and animal fibres another and radically different class of dye. As proof—we call attention to the fact that manufacturers of woolen goods use one class of dye, while manufacturers of cotton goods use an entirely different class of dye.

Do Not Be Deceived

For these reasons we manufacture one class of Diamond Dyes for coloring Cotton, Linen, or Mixed Goods, and another class of Diamond Dyes for coloring Wool or Silk, so that you may obtain the ve. best results on EVERY fabric.

REMEMBER: To get the best possible results in coloring Cotton, Linen, or Mixed Goods, use the Diamond Dyes manufactured especially for Cotton, Linen, or Mixed Goods.

AND REMEMBER: To get the best possible results in coloring Wool or Silk, use the Diamond Dyes manufactured especially for Wool or Silk.

YOU can have lots of fun with a home-made drawing camera. Rig a box 6x6 inches by 12 inches long the inside. Then get a piece of ground glass six inches square, a mirror 6x8½ inches, and a convex lens from an old camera, opera glass, microscope or bicycle lantern. Place the box in the lengthwise position and remove exactly half the top. Fit a mirror in a diagonal position in the opening, so that looking downward into the box the opposite end of it is reflected in the mirror. Cut out a circle in the surface opposite the mirror and fit your lens neatly into it. Now put the ground glass over the opening on the top and glue it in place. The rays of light pass through the lens and are reflected on the ground glass by the mirror. A paper may be placed over the ground glass and the object reflected, which will be reduced in correct proportion, can be easily traced. You don't know how much fun there is in a home-made drawing camera until you try it out for yourself.

RIDAY, February 14. John 1: 35-47. Our Lord delights to glorify the commonplace. He loves to fill the common water-pots with his mysterious wine. He chooses the earthen vessels into which to put his treasure. He calls obscure fishermen to be the ambassadors of his grace. He pro-ims his great Gospel through provincial dialects, and he fills uncultured uths with mighty arguments. He turns common meals into sacraments, and ile he breaks ordinary bread he relates it to the blessing of heaven.

And "this same Jesus" is among us to-day, with the same choices and delights. will make a humdrum duty shine like the wayside bush that burned with e and was not consumed. He will make our daily business the channel of his ce. He will take our disappointments, and, just as we sometimes put bank-es into black-edged envelopes, he will fill them with treasures of unspeakable solation. He will use our poor, broken, stammering speech to convey the nders of his grace to the weary, sinful souls of men.

Yes, the good Lord loves the commonplaces. He will take a mere worm, and vert it into "a threshing instrument with teeth," enabling it to leave its mark the life of its day and generation.

ATURDAY, February 15. Luke 5: 27-32. Matthew was very weary, and the all-seeing Lord read the signs of his spiritual dissatisfaction and unrest. As Jesus "passed by" nothing escaped his watchful eye. He saw a look in Matthew's eye as of some caged creature longing for freedom. tthew's office, the contempt of his fellows, and perhaps his own self-contempt d him in imprisoning disquietude. The Lord knew it all, and one word from n and the iron gate was open, and the prisoner was free! "Follow me! And left all, rose up, and followed him." With the Lord's command was conveyed e ability to obey, and Matthew stepped into "the glorious liberty of the chil-en of God."

And this is the Master's way. His calls are always equipments. Every ceived commandment is also the vehicle of requisite grace. God's decrees are o promises, nay, they are immediate endowments. If we reverently open one his callings we shall find it a store-house of needed strength.

And therefore we need not fear the calls of the Lord. They are not the harsh mmandments of a tyrant, they are the loving invitations of a friend. If we ey them we shall taste the grace of them, and "His statutes will become our ngs."

A Great Astronomer

A STROKE of apoplexy on New Year's Day, from which he did not recover consciousness, terminated the life of the noted astronomer, Dr. Lewis Swift, on Sunday morning, January 5, at the home of his daughter, Mrs. Mary L. Brink, at Marathon, N. Y. He was born February 29, 1820, in Clarkson, N. Y., reaching the ripe age of ninety-three years.

His ancestry in this country dates back to William Swift, who emigrated to America from England about 1630. His grandfather, Rowland Swift, was a soldier in the American Revolutionary War, and his father was General Lewis Swift. Dr. Swift, the subject of this sketch, descended from sturdy stock. His grandfather, Rowland Swift, reached the age of ninety-six years.

Dr. Swift married in 1850, and soon after decided to make the science of astronomy his life study. His education, except for three years at the Clarkson Academy, was gained at a primitive country school.

In 1872 he became a resident of the city of Rochester. For five years his observation place was the roof of a cider mill, where he discovered six comets, which won for him the appellation of "the comet finder." For three of these comets he was awarded the gold medals of the Imperial Academy of Science of Vienna. In 1881 the Lalande prize medal was bestowed on him by the Institute of France. Afterward he received three bronze medals from the Astronomical Society of the Pacific, and the Mrs. Jackson Gilt Prize from the Royal Astronomical Society of England. In 1879 the degree of Ph.D. was conferred on him by the Rochester University. In 1882 he became the director of the Warner Observatory in Rochester. In 1894, after the financial failure of Mr. Warner, he moved with his family and instruments to California and became director of the Lowe Observatory on Echo Mountain, where he remained until physical infirmities caused him to resign.

It was the writer's privilege to pass a night with Dr. Swift in the Warner Observatory; this was the beginning of our acquaintance. He was one of the devout astronomers, and believed in the divine authority of the Bible. Many readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will recall his series of articles on the astronomy of the Bible, published in this paper in 1904.

Those who knew him personally can easily bear witness to his genial and heroic nature. At the age of twelve he had the misfortune to dislocate a hip by a fall. It was never set, and he was lamed for life. For many years his hearing was seriously impaired, and for a number of years before his death he was entirely deaf and nearly blind, but his keenness of intellect and jovial disposition were retained to the end.

The following paragraph, which closes one of his articles in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, is a window opening into his inner self. He has passed from his lifework on earth to some realization of these yearnings. "When I ask myself where are we going, there steal over me feelings of sadness as to how little we know about the countless millions of suns like our own, that bear us company in our endless flight. We are just passing through the threshold of heaven's wide-open door; but by and by, when we pass over the threshold of that house not made with hands, we may be able to see light where all is now bathed in darkness unfathomable."

COFFEE THRESHED HER
15 Long Years

"For over fifteen years," writes a patient, hopeful little Ills. woman, "while a coffee drinker, I suffered from Spinal Irritation and Nervous trouble. I was treated by good physicians, but did not get much relief.

"I never suspected that coffee might be aggrevating my condition. (Tea is just as injurious, because it contains caffeine, the same drug found in coffee.) I was down-hearted and discouraged, but prayed daily that I might find something to help me.

"Several years ago, while at a friend's house, I drank a cup of Postum and thought I had never tasted anything more delicious.

"From that time on I used Postum instead of coffee and soon began to improve in health, so that now I can walk half a dozen blocks or more with ease, and do many other things that I never thought I would be able to do again in this world.

"My appetite is good, I sleep well and find life is worth living, indeed. I lady of my acquaintance said she did not like Postum, it was so weak and tasteless.

"I explained to her the difference when it is made right — boiled according to directions. She was glad to know this because coffee did not agree with her. Now her folks say they expect to use Postum the rest of their lives." Name given upon request. Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a reason."

Postum now comes in concentrated, powder form, called Instant Postum. It is prepared by stirring a level teaspoonful in a cup of hot water, adding sugar to taste, and enough cream to bring the color to golden brown.

Instant Postum is convenient; there's no waste; and the flavour is always uniform. Sold by grocers — 45 to 50-cup tin 30 cts., 90 to 100-cup tin 50 cts.

A 5-cup trial tin mailed for grocer's name and 2-cent stamp for postage. Postum Cereal Co., Ltd., Battle Creek, Mich.

THE PAPACY IN POLITICS

BY REV. WILLIAM DALLMANN

WHEN Daniel O'Connell was urged to some political move on religious grounds he answered: "We take our religion, not our politics, from Rome." When Bismarck strove to get the vote of the Center for his army bill and urged religious reasons, Windthorst replied: "This is not a religious measure but a political; and though letters from Rome urge us to vote for the bill, we refuse to do so."

The above was said the Paulist Father Burke in a sermon in St. Patrick's Cathedral, New York, on December 20, 1908, in the presence of Archbishop Farley. These instances show that sometimes some Catholics are better citizens than papists, but they also show that the Pope does dictate in purely political matters; Father Burke himself furnishes historical proofs for this accusation. He says:

No matter how much the Church may advocate the union of Church and State where such conditions prevail, no matter how much she has insisted upon such a union in other lands and in other times, she has never advocated a union of Church and State in America. On the contrary, in her principles and in the writings of her Supreme Pontiffs, she has ever told the Catholics of America that they should give their entire allegiance to the constitution of the country, and if necessary lay down their lives in her defense. With conscientious rectitude, therefore, every Catholic must unequivocally subscribe to the constitution.

Father Burke is contradicted by Vicar General Preston. In a sermon preached in New York January 9, 1913, the vicar general said:

Every word Leo speaks from his high chair is the voice of the Holy Ghost, and must be heard. To every Catholic heart comes no thought but obedience. You must not think as you choose; you must think as Catholics. Any man who says, I will take my faith from Rome, but I will not take my politics from Rome, is not a true Catholic. The Church teaches that the Supreme Pontiff must be obeyed, because he is the vicar of the Lord: "Christ speaks through him."

Who is right, Burke or Preston? "Roma locuta, res finita." Let the infallible Pope decide whether the Pope is in American politics or not. We quote from The Encyclical Letters of Pope Leo XIII, published by Benziger Brothers, New York, 1903:

Pope Leo XIII., in his encyclical, Immortale Dei, of November 1, 1885, says: It is "a sin for the state not to favor religion. . . . the religion which God enjoins . . . the one true religion." (p. 111.)

A sin in the state not to favor the Roman Catholic religion! That is a sad beginning.

The "orderly connection" between Church and State "may be compared to the union of soul and body of man." (p. 115.)

As the soul rules the body, so the Pope is to rule the United States. That seems to be plain enough.

"There was once a time when Church and State were happily united. (pp. 119, 120.)

He condemns the State for thinking "is bound to grant equal rights to every creed, so that public order may not be disturbed by any particular form of religious belief."

It is an "unrightful position" that the Catholic religion is allowed a standing in civil society equal only . . . to societies alien from it. (p. 121.)

He condemns men for beginning to say out "that matters affecting the Church must be separated from those of the State." (p. 122.)

To exclude the Church . . . from the power of making laws . . . is a grave and fatal error. (p. 124.) Gregory XVI, in his encyclical letter Mirari vos, of date August 15, 1832, inveighed with weighty words against the Catholicisms . . . that no preference should be shown for any particular form of worship; that it is right for individuals to form their own personal judgments about religion; that each man's conscience is his sole and all-sufficient guide . . . the desire that the Church be separated from the State. (p. 125.)

To the like effect . . . did Pius IX pronounce and publicly many false opinions. . . . It will suffice to indicate a few: Prop. 55. The Church must be separated from the State and the State from the Church. (p. 125, 126.) (This is condemned.)

The Church, indeed, deems it unlawful to admit the various forms of divine worship on the same footing as the true religion (Roman Catholic). (p. 127.)

Catholics should . . . give their attention to national politics. If not, "this would tend also to the injury of the Christian religion, forasmuch as those would come into power who are badly disposed towards the Church, and those who are willing to befriend her would be deprived of all influence." (p. 131.)

In politics, too, all are to "follow the guidance of the Apostolic See as their rule of life and obey the bishops whom the Holy Ghost has placed to rule the Church of God." (p. 132.)

Pope Leo XIII in his encyclical, Libertas Praestantissimum, of June 20, 1888, speaks of "the fatal theory of the need of separation between Church and State. The absurdity of such a position is manifest." He condemns liberty of speech and liberty of the press (p. 151).

He condemns "liberty of conscience . . . that every one may, as he chooses, worship God or not" (p. 155).

These evils may be tolerated as long as necessary by the Church.

And although in the extraordinary condition of these times the Church usually acquiesces in certain modern liberties, not because she prefers them in themselves, but because she judges it expedient to permit them, she would in happier times exercise her own liberty; and by persuasion, exhortation, and entreaty, would endeavor, as she is bound, to fulfil the duty assigned to her by God of providing for the eternal salvation of mankind. (p. 158.)

That fatal principle of the separation of Church and State. (p. 159.)

He condemns those who "maintain that it does not belong to her (the Church) to . . . punish" (p. 160).

Does this mean that if the Church has the power it will restore the Inquisition and "punish" non-Catholics?

Pope Leo XIII in his encyclical Sapientiae Christianae of January 10, 1890, says: "It is not enough to obey the Pope in dogmas and doctrines."

The Church cannot give countenance or favor to those . . . who make it their aim and purpose to tear asunder the alliance that should, by the very nature of things, connect the interests of religion (Roman Catholic) with those of the State. Where the Church does not forbid taking part in public affairs, it is fit and proper to give support to men of acknowledged worth, and who pledge themselves to deserve well in the Catholic cause. (p. 198.)

We invite the reader to examine again the last sentence.

The political prudence of private individuals would seem to consist wholly in carrying out faithfully the orders issued by lawful authority. (p. 201.)

If this does not mean that Catholics must vote as the Pope directs, what does it mean?

It is the Pope's charge not only to rule the Church, but generally . . . to regulate the actions of Christian citizens. . . . Whence it is clear that in addition to the complete accordance of thought and deed, the faithful should imitate the practical political wisdom of the ecclesiastical authority. (p. 202.)

Here surely is an illustration of "practical" political wisdom!

Pope Leo XIII in his encyclical letter, Longinque Oceani, of January 6, 1895, admits that in the United States the Roman Catholic Church enjoys full liberty, but he would like that in addition to liberty, she enjoyed the favor of the laws and the patronage of the public authority. (p. 324.)

This is to be brought about "by yielding a hearty submission and obedience to the Church." (p. 330.)

In other words, the Catholic citizen is to vote as directed by the Pope.

In his encyclical letter, Testem Benevolentiae, of January 22, 1899, to Cardinal Gibbons, Leo XIII is not willing that the Roman Catholic Church, "relaxing her ancient vigor, show some indulgence to modern popular theories and methods" (p. 442).

Rome cannot change, because whatever she teaches, even "by the ordinary universal magisterium of the Pope, is "to be believed as having been divinely revealed," according to the Vatican decrees. (p. 443.)

"Roma semper eadem"—Rome is ever the same. What the Papacy has been in the past it is now, and it will be in the future. As the soul rules the body, so the Pope would rule the United States. The Papacy is in politics.

The Howard Watch

THE best of attention and service for the man who carries a HOWARD Watch—not on account of the watch, but because he is likely to be that kind of a man.

The possession of a HOWARD undoubtedly does suggest a man who appreciates quality and is quite able to know whether he is getting it or not; a man who respects HOWARD history; and withal, the practical man of orderly mind who expects to have things done on time.

A HOWARD Watch is always worth what you pay for it.

The price of each watch is fixed at the factory and a printed ticket attached—from the 17-jewel (double roller) in a Crescent Extra or Boss Extra gold-filled case at $40 to the 23-jewel at $150—and the EDWARD HOWARD model at $350.

Not every jeweler can sell you a HOWARD WATCH. Find the HOWARD jeweler in your town and talk to him. He is a good man to know.

Admiral Sigsbee has written a little book, "The Log of the HOWARD Watch," giving the record of his own HOWARD in the U. S. Navy. You'll enjoy it. Drop us a post card, Dept. W, and we'll send you a copy.

World-Wide Christianity

ON JANUARY 4 seven men left New York on a tour around the world in the interest of the Men and Religion Forward Movement. They were Mr. Fred B. Smith, the evangelist, who directed the recent American campaign; Mr. Raymond Robins, business man and social service expert; Mr. J. H. Lathrop, secretary, and Messrs. Paul J. Gilbert, P. H. Metcalf, C. M. Keeler and Edward W. Peck, members of the International Y. M. C. A. Quartet. Mr. H. N. Holmes, of New Zealand, is acting as advance agent, and is already in the Orient arranging the details for the meetings and conferences to be visited by these American workers.

The object of the pilgrimage is to inspire and train the men of other lands to conduct campaigns like that which so stirred the men of America a few months ago.

Announcement should also be made of the appearance of the seven bound volumes containing the reports of the various commissions of the American Men and Religion Forward Movement and some of the addresses made at the Conservation Congress held at New York last April. The volumes form a library of immense value not only to professional Christian workers, but to church members, Sunday school workers, and all who are interested in the progress of Christ's kingdom. The set includes: Congress Addresses, Social Service, Bible Study and Evangelism, Christian Unity and Missions, Boy's Work, the Rural Church, the Church and the Press. The first volume contains addresses by William J. Bryan, Editor Macdonald, Booker T. Washington, Richmond P. Hobson, John H. Jowett and others; the volume on Social Service, in addition to the strong report of the commission on this subject, brings messages from Professor Rauschenbusch, Washington Gladden, Jane Addams, Professor Steiner, and John Mitchell; the volume on Bible Study and Evangelism is full of magnificent material; the report of the commission on missions, including such men as Robert E. Speer and John R. Mott, is a frank statement of the missionary situation and full of practical suggestions for meeting it; the volume about Boys' Work is fresh, vigorous, scientific, practical and spiritual.

In addition to these items of far-reaching religious activity and the great preparations for the Livingstone centennial, which occurs on March 19, two important recent events relate to the world-wide movement of Christ's army. The Foreign Missions Conference of North America, representing about forty denominational boards and a number of interdenominational agencies, met at Garden City, N. Y., January 15-17. Addresses were made by Robert E. Speer, S. Earl Taylor and other missionary experts. Preceding this gathering there was a special conference of missionary leaders in New York on January 14 to consider the Mohammedan situation. Just now the Moslems are making especially aggressive campaigns, particularly in Africa, but, on the other hand, there is a new spirit of tolerance and receptivity for the Christian message.

* Men and Religion Messages. Seven volumes. New York. The Association Press. $4.

AUNT HANNAH ON THE RELIEF FUND

BY MARY B. WINGATE

I'VE ben readin' about the dreadful war, and how THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has started a relief fund for the widows and orphans. I do hate to hear of a war an' it does seem's if arbitration ought to have stopped it before it begun; but I can't blame them poor people one mite. Turkey's ben pizen ugly to them Christians long enough. Nothin' has been too bad for them to do, and perhaps the only way to have a lastin' peace with the Turks was to fight till they've got enough of it. I do hope there wont be no disposition to retaliate, an' that the prisoners of war'll be took good care of an' fed, even when food's scarce, an' famine prices at that.

Ever since I was a little girl an' studied 'bout Turkey and Mahomet in my geography I've heard it said, "As cruel as a Turk." Some of the sufferin' they've caused others has come back to them "full measure, pressed and running over"—not that all of them are to blame, but the innocent allers has to suffer with the guilty, at least in this world. I'm tryin' to pray for the Turks too, but my! it's hard work tryin' to love them; but still they're human bein's, and of course they've got souls, so it's our duty to pray for them.

Now, I know folks round here—specially the "charity begins ter home" kind—will say it's all nonsense sendin' money out to them Balkan States when the people are all strangers and furriners to us; but don't the Bible teach us to be kind to that very class, specially to disciples? an' that's what they be, as fur as they know how, an' they've died for their faith, thousands of them.

Even with the cost of "high livin'" at home, we don't let people starve here, not when we know it. I dried all the apples I could last fall to give to the poor, an' I got a lot of second-hand clo'es to make over and I've got some things on hand all ready to give away; an' when I make soup, I carry a bowl full to some poor neighbors, an' they do say as ought to know, that my soup's real good and nourishin'. How I just wish I could make a biler full every week for them and send money to them too! I laid awake nights wonderin' how I could get any, for it took all I could get out of my cow and hens to buy wood and pervisions for winter; besides I must do somethin' more on church expenses. Well, I told the Lord all about it, and just before Christmas I had a letter from my nephew, George Henry, up in New York, and he sez, sez he, "Aunt Hannah, you used to do for me; now my time has come to do for you an' I'm sendin' you fifty dollars to help out." My! Wan't I some tickled? George Henry never spiles a gift by telling me what to do with it; he knows 'tain't no use neither. Besides, he likes to give himself; you see I bro't him up to do for others. Now I'll have jest five dollars for the Relief Fund. I know the Lord sent that money in answer to prayer, an' I mean to use it all for him.

I had a real good Christmas an' I had some of the Lord's poor to help me eat it too, an' I never felt more Christmasy in all my life. I'm readin' about the sufferin' an' the relief to my young folks who come here for their candy pulls and oyster stews.

You see, I have a bright open fire, and I make it jolly for them an' feel that it's the Lord's own work. One boy said to me t'other day, "I'd a lot ruther come here an' play games than go down street evenin's, an' oh, Aunt Hannah, I know a lot of boys that'll go to the bad if they keep on as they are. Can't I invite them up here? I'll keep them civil." I told him yes and welcome. I'm going to try and interest them all in that Relief Fund. 'Tain't much use to talk to older folks after their hearts git cold an' selfish; but I allers succeed with my young folks, so you may expect another five dollars by and by for that Relief Fund.

Pittsfield, Me.

HIGH PRAISE FOR THE ALMANAC

I received The Christian Herald Almanac to-day. It certainly is a vade mecum. It is invaluable because of the information contained in its pages. It will become a recognized authority on points of controversy. Its facts are indisputable. They could not be obtained elsewhere for many times the subscription price of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Thank you for sending it. MRS. G. H. WHEELER.
Brooklyn, N. Y.

TO OUR READERS

WE HAVE received a letter from one of our subscribers asking whether it is really necessary for us to publish advertisements in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. For answer we might ask, Does the subscriber ever stop to think of the enormous amount of labor and expense involved in supplying THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for a year's subscription? For instance, 52 times a year we send you a well-printed and well-edited paper containing the week's news of the world from the Christian standpoint; 52 times a year we must pay for the printing; 52 times a year we must pay the salaries of the office force that looks after the details of the various departments. The paper for an average issue costs $4,000; the ink used in one week costs more than $400. Then there is rent, wrapping, postage, editorial work, light, power, and composition to be paid for. Presses are expensive and wear out. A few weeks ago a new press costing $22,000 was installed. All this is required to make THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, for which the subscriber pays three cents per copy.

Now, this is far from being sufficient to pay for the labor and expense of producing and mailing such a paper as THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. The difference between what we receive for subscriptions and what it costs us to produce the paper must be made up from the income from advertisements. And as long as these advertisements are of the highest quality, there can be no objection to them.

Advertising has changed greatly since the first issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD was printed. Through the persistent efforts of men in the advertising profession, the greater part of present-day advertising has become news. No responsible editor of a newspaper deliberately plans to print inaccurate news, and no sensible merchant attempts to deceive the people whom he wants to interest in his business. Whenever any of our subscribers is defrauded by an advertiser in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD we will make good the claim, provided that the subscriber, who must be of record, has mentioned THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in writing to the advertiser, and provided the claim is made to us within two months of the date of the appearance of the advertisement. This guarantee does not apply to investment advertisements.

Advertising has become not only an unobjectionable but a necessary adjunct even to religious papers, which, with its help, are able to produce bigger, brighter and better editions than they could possibly produce without it. And the reader who sends an order to an advertiser mentioning that he had seen the ad in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD not only benefits himself, but helps the publication as well.

The Temperance War*

C. E. and B. Y. P. U. Topic

THE most important single issue in the temperance war just now is the vote on the Kenyon-Sheppard bill in Congress. This vote was to have been taken on January 20, but by some adroit manipulation the opponents of the bill succeeded in having it set aside until February 10. The young people's societies will be able to get the news of the vote in time for this meeting. As THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of this issue goes to press the prospects for its passing are very good. The bill prohibits the carrying of liquor from wet States into dry for purposes of sale. The question of restoring the canteen to the United States army is pending in Congress, and temperance people should be industrious in sending letters and petitions against the proposition which would undo one of the finest temperance victories of recent years.

If the leaders of the meeting would obtain from the office of The American Issue, the official organ of the Anti-Saloon League, published at Westerville, Ohio, copies of two small maps of the United States published by that organization, they would have a demonstration more forcible than any words of the sweeping victories of temperance during the last twenty years.

The map of 1893 shows 29 States entirely or almost entirely wet, 13 partly dry and 6 dry. It is a decidedly black looking diagram. The latest map shows the situation almost completely reversed. It looks almost entirely white in comparison with the first. Only six States are positively black, and most of these have some white spots. The center and lower sections of the picture are delightfully free from black spots. In the center North Dakota, Kansas, and Oklahoma are entirely dry; South Dakota, Wyoming, New Mexico, Iowa and Arkansas are nearly dry; Colorado, Utah, Texas and Louisiana show broad fields of white. Eastward, Maine, Tennessee, North Carolina and Mississippi are all white. Georgia has allowed some black spots to creep back. Many of the other States make a fine showing of dry territory.

The greatest victory of recent months is that in West Virginia, where, in the November elections, the State went dry by the splendid majority of 91,806 in a vote of about 237,000. Reports from other quarters are also encouraging. Two-thirds of the townships of Ontario have gone dry. This is the more remarkable when it is remembered that the Canadian law requires a two-thirds vote in any township or parish to oust the saloon. Temperance leaders in that province are confident that with this magnificent record it will not be long before the public bar will be abolished entirely from Ontario. There are no saloons in Prince Edward Island. In New Brunswick and Newfoundland there are almost no saloons except in one or two of the larger cities. New Zealand has registered a majority of 54.3 per cent. against the saloon. The law requires a 60 per cent. majority, and it is expected that in two years New Zealand will be added to the dry territories of the world. Iceland has no saloons. Finland abolished the liquor traffic, but Russia vetoed the action and forced the continuance of the saloon.

While the United States has reason to feel encouraged that the liquor business has been ruled out of so much of its territory, there is room for unspeakable humiliation in the fact that last year two and one-half billions of dollars were spent for intoxicating drinks. When all the misery and sin are added to the mere waste of this shameful expenditure, the vastness of the task remaining to be done may be

NOT FICTION, BUT THE TRUTH

Strange Adventures of Captain Quinton

As Thrilling As Robinson Crusoe

Captain Robert Quinton

As Compelli As David Livingsto

The Strange Adventures of Captain Quinton is one of the most remarkable book of its kind yet published. It reveals a new world of adventure that is amazing to con template. More than all, it is true. It is not a mere figment of the imagination. Th things described really happened. Yet Stanley, Livingstone, and Peary, all together had not so many escapes from death as had this unassuming sailor-man, whose simpl and convincing story is as the essence of truth.

Open the book at any place, and you will find him encountering one or more o innumerable perils—canoeing on a boiling lake; escaping under a shower of poisone arrows; battling with cannibals; racing through the tropical night in a launch, pursue by crocodiles; imprisoned in a ship's cabin by a horde of monster devilfish; spending the night in a tree with a leopard; battling hand to hand with head-hunters; being pursued by angry monkeys; running a gantlet of war canoes.

WILL INTEREST WOMEN AND MEN ALIKE

These are sanguinary experiences which must be read with bated breath, yet they are not more thrilling in their way than are the exquisite descriptions of treasure-chambers in caves lurid and beautiful as a dream of the Arabian Nights; of a wave dance in which tribes of cannibals with an uncanny sense of beauty and rhythm represent with their bodies the ocean dashing high on imaginary coral reefs; of a silvery night spent in tropical tree-tops in order to witness the stately dawn-dance of birds of paradise. The very multiplicity of incident is overpowering, but it must be remembered that the experiences of over thirty years are crowded into this book.

Assuredly Captain Quinton's truth is stranger than any fiction possibly could be, and the spirit of the South Seas is in it.

It is a big book, too, 496 pages and 175,000 words, enclosed in illustrated binding, and with a frontispiece portrait of the author, this man whose life has hung in the balance so many times, and who yet has lived to tell the tale.

We will send you, postpaid, The Strange Adventures of Captain Quinton (handsomely bound in cloth), The Christian Herald Almanac for 1913, and The Christian Herald for One full Year—all three for only $2

Or, we will send to old subscribers, Free, as a premium, The Strange Adventures of Captain Quinton for sending us one new yearly subscription to The Christian Herald with $1.50.

Faith and Works*

Epworth League Topic

I WILL show thee my faith by my works." That is the answer of James to those who question his philosophy. We are saved by faith, but a faith that is real will work. A passage which might well have been added to the fine list of references assigned for our study is Gal. 5: 6: "For in Jesus Christ neither circumcision availeth anything, nor uncircumcision; but faith which worketh by love."

Again attention should be called to the fact that many religious problems are easily settled by going back to first principles and remembering what religion is. Religion is a life; religion is love; religion is fruit-bearing. Now none of these things can be produced in the human soul by anything that it can do. Religion must come down; it is something that God, by a miracle, puts into the soul. We cannot earn it; we cannot buy it; we cannot get it in exchange for work. It is God's gift, purchased by the blood of Christ, and received by faith.

But when the faith has gone up and the religion has come down, then real action begins. The "faith worketh." There are others to be told about this gracious and uttermost salvation; there are the crying needs of the men and women and little children who live in want and misery and sin; there is the patient Christ who redeemed us calling us to go out and finish the work he had to leave undone—nations unenlightened, wrongs unrighted, hearts and homes full of darkness and despair. "If ye love me," he said, "keep my commandments." How can we help keeping them when he loves us so mightily, when he has saved us so gloriously, when he loves so tenderly those who need the help that we can bring them in his name?

* EPWORTH LEAGUE TOPIC for Sunday, February 16, 1913. "Genuine Faith Shows Itself by Acts." Matt. 7:24; James 1: 22-24; 4: 17. I Sam. 15:22; James 2:18.

Work of the "Gospel Yacht"

—CAPTAIN BENN, of the Gospel yacht Messenger, reports 1912 a most successful year. Altogether one thousand barrels, or about one hundred tons, of good literature were distributed among sailors on incoming vessels in the port of New York. Many Gospel services have been held on the various vessels, often on board the foreign vessels by means of interpreters. At Christmas 20,000 presents were given out to sailors. At Thanksgiving time a number of dinners were provided for the poor families forming part of the curious colony of canal-boat people spending the winter on their boats which lie at anchor in the bay. A dinner was offered to the captain of a Nova Scotian sailing vessel; he wished to pay for it, but was assured that money could not secure the dinner; it was provided by people who loved the souls of the sailors. He was so impressed by the gift and the spirit of it that he consented to kneel in prayer with Captain Benn, and then and there gave his heart to God. All who are interested in the work of the Messenger and her captain may address the Mission Yacht Association (Incorporated), in care the Maritime Exchange, 80 Broad Street, New York. Literature for distribution should be sent to Captain Benn at the Baltic Terminal, Brooklyn, N. Y.

WE INVITE
Every Thin Man and Woman

This is an invitation that no thin man or woman can afford to ignore. We invite you to try a new treatment called "Sargol" that helps digest the food you eat—putting good solid flesh on people that are thin and under weight.

How can "Sargol" do this? We will tell you. This new treatment is a scientific, assimilative agent for increasing cell growth, the very substance of which our bodies are made—putting the red corpuscles in the blood, which every thin person so sadly needs, strengthening the nerves and putting the digestive tract in such shape that every ounce of food gives out its full amount of nourishment to the blood instead of passing through the system undigested and unassimilated.

Women who never appear stylish in anything they wore because of their thinness, men under weight or lacking in nerve force or energy, tell how they have been made to enjoy the pleasures of life—been fitted to fight life's battles, as never for year's through the use of "Sargol."

If you want a beautiful and well rounded figure of which you can justly be proud—a body full of throbbing life and energy, write the Sargol Co., 9-B Herald Building, Binghamton, N. Y., to-day, for 50c box "Sargol," absolutely free, and use with every meal.

But you say that you want proof! Well, here you are. Here is the statement of those who have tried, been convinced, and will swear to the virtues of this preparation:

REV. GEORGE W. DAVIS says:

"I have made a faithful trial of the Sargol treatment and must say it has brought to me new life and vigor. I have gained 20 pounds and now weigh 170 pounds and, what is better, I have gained the days of my boyhood. It has been the turning point of my life."

MRS. A. I. RODENHEISER writes:

"I have gained immensely since I took Sargol, for I only weighed about 106 pounds when I began using it and now I weigh 130 pounds, so this makes 24 pounds. I feel stronger and am looking better than ever before, and now I carry rosy cheeks, which is something I could never say before."

CLAY JOHNSON says:

"Please send me another ten day treatment. I am well pleased with Sargol. It has been the light of my life. I am getting back to my proper weight again. When I began to take Sargol I only weighed 138 pounds, and now four weeks later, I am weighing 153 pounds and feeling fine."

F. GAGNON writes:

"Here is my report since taking the Sargol treatment. I am a man 67 years of age, and was all run down to the very bottom. I had to quit work, as I was so weak. Now, thanks to Sargol, I look like a new man. I gained 22 pounds with 23 days' treatment. I cannot tell you how happy I feel."

MRS. VERNIE ROUSE says:

"Sargol is certainly the grandest treatment I ever used. I took only two boxes of Sargol. My weight was 120 pounds and now I weigh 140 and feel better than I have for five years. I am now as fleshy as I want to be, and shall certainly recommend Sargol, for it does just exactly what you say it will do."

Full address of any of these people if you wish.

Probably you are now thinking whether all this can be true. Stop it! We say Sargol does make thin people add flesh. But we don't ask you to take our word for it. Write us today and we will send you absolutely free a 50c package for trial. Cut off coupon below and pin to your letter.

THIS COUPON GOOD FOR 50c PACKAGE "SARGOL"

This coupon entitles any thin person to one 50c package "Sargol" (provided you have never tried it and that 10c is enclosed to help pay distribution expenses). The Sargol Company, 9-B Herald Building, Binghamton, New York.

BOWERY MISSION TESTIMONIES

1. Mr. Theodore Moje

I WAS born in the city of Hamburg, Germany, and brought up as the oldest of five children. I was educated in the public school until my fourteenth year. Then I learned the trade of cabinet-maker and carpenter and was ambitious to learn the higher branches of the trade and architectural drawing. I lost my mother when I was seventeen years of age. This was the turning point in my life. I became indifferent to the church and to God, and although I became an expert in my trade, there was no real blessing in my life.

At the age of twenty-nine I married, but the relatives of my wife were against me, and I became a drinking man. My daughter was born a year after my marriage, and for the child's sake I tried to keep straight but failed. I loved my child dearly, but my drinking habits grew upon me and I was obliged to leave the city. Eight years afterward I returned and saw my child, but she did not know me and told me her father was dead. This troubled me so that I drank harder than ever. I even attempted suicide. On each occasion God wonderfully delivered me. I wanted to die. I even went so far as to charge myself with having killed a woman, and was nearly lynched, but my innocence was proved and I escaped. I was in prison for over sixteen months, and during that time my wife died. My brothers promising to look after my child until I could make a home for her, I came to America. I soon obtained employment but the drink curse followed, and at last I became a Bowery outcast.

In July, 1904, God led me to the Bowery Mission, where I found Christ as my personal Saviour. Not knowing much of the English language I was in the meetings for three months before I ventured to give a testimony. Mr. C. D. Usinger was at that time appointed superintendent of the Faith Mission, in West Sixtieth Street, and I went with him as one of his workers, and during the last eight years have done the best work I could in that corner of the vineyard.

All my prayers were answered but one, the prayer that I might be reunited with my daughter whom I had not seen since she was a little child, and from whom I had not heard for twelve years. I did not know even that she was alive. I had given up all hope of seeing her again.

I did what people do when they want to speak to some one on the telephone. They call up "Central" and are put in connection. I cried to God and he at last brought the reunion around. My daughter had been brought up strictly by her grandmother until she was nineteen years of age, and up to that time she had been given to understand that her father was dead. Learning, however, from my brother that I was in America, and seeing a little picture of me which I had sent, she decided to come and seek me. She came expecting to see an old drunkard, but really hoping for a life of freedom from restraint and worldly pleasure in this great country. To her surprise, however, she found me a fully established Christian man. On one of the first Sunday mornings after her arrival I took her to the Bowery Mission, and there she heard the story of my conversion. I told it first in English and then, at the request of the superintendent, in German. At its close I found my dear child in tears. The truth of the Gospel had found its way into her own heart. She commenced to pray, and this time it was not a poor, despised, drunken outcast who realized salvation in the Bowery Mission, but a well-to-do young lady. In her last letter to her grandmother she sent the joyful news that she had found Christ, as her father did eight years ago, in the Bowery Mission.

I will tell you how to become a prosperous Fruit Rancher in the San Joaquin Valley, California

I will show you how to go to work to get a home for yours and those dependent upon you.

California is no lotus land, where men gain wealth and ease without effo But its great central valley is blessed with a soil of wonderful fertility. T high Sierras furnish an abundance of water for irrigation. The climate ideally arranged for the perfect ripening of a wide range of fruits, vegetabl grain crops, and live stock. The social organization effected by those n there makes it a splendid country in which to build a home and rear a fami It is a land blessed with tremendous natural advantages, and every ambitio earnest, industrious man who goes, will find there the conditions necessary insure a permanent success.

Fruit ranching is the way to the greatest ultimate profit. But the develo ment of a good grove, orchard or vineyard takes time. So we say, go slo even to those who are financially able to enter the business and carry it un the trees and vines have had time to come into bearing. Plant only a part your land to trees, use the rest for quick-money crops. Plant to alfalfa a buy a few dairy cows. These, with a flock of chickens and turkeys, a few ho and a garden, will meet the running expense until the fruit begins to come i Then orchard or vineyard gradually may be enlarged until all the land planted. The resulting profit is your absolute insurance against the future.

You will not have to undergo pioneer privations. The San Joaquin Valle is a finished country. The varieties of fruit best adapted to the several section are known. Irrigation water is ready or economically may be developed. Th fruit growers' exchanges and other marketing organizations have perfected system of getting greatest returns for the grower. The state is spending mil lions of money on country roads. California's school system is superior t any in the country, and the state-wide library organization gives to all access t the great collection of books in the state library.

In a word, you will find here a splendid country for business, even a finer country for home-making, and the greatest country in the world for children.

I believe that every man who buys land in California to-day will find his place an asset of increasing value every year hereafter.

I am anxious to get into touch with men and women who are considering the West as a place to make a home. I know that the organization of which I am the head is in a position to be of great service to all, and I want you t feel at liberty to call upon me for any information about California that you may require. This service is free.

We have just published an illustrated folder describing the San Joaquin Valley. It's free. Read it.

CLARENCE LESLIE FINLAYSON, seven months old, is entered on the lists of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD as a new subscriber. He is the youngest subscriber on record. Her mother said: 'Make me a little Christian.' Instantly the little one said: 'Our Father, make me a little CHRISTIAN HERALD.' Those who heard it were surprised that she ever knew the different periodicals; but she does and can pick her CHRISTIAN HERALD every time."

organ. Miss Eva Emmett Wycoff, soprano, charmed the men with her exquisite soprano songs; Mrs. Boynton, mezzo-soprano; Dr. Ion Jackson, tenor soloist at St. Nicholas'; and Dr. Samuel Evans, baritone, delighted the waiting guests. Addresses were made by General Horatio C. King; Dr. David James Burrell; Dr. C. H. Mead, Superintendent J. G. Hallimond, Dr. Ferdinand C. Iglehart, Dr. Anthony H. Evans, Dr. H. P. Lyman-Wheaton, Dr. G. A. Gayer and Rev. A. H. Howland.

Feasting, singing, or listening, the men were thrilled with almost reverent gratitude for the noble woman who had remembered them and their needs at this hour of her happiness.

Each group of men, gathered in the auditorium to wait the call to dinner joined in rousing cheers in honor of their gentle hostess, and enthusiastically endorsed the following resolution, which was duly forwarded to Mrs. Shepard:

"The men of the Bowery Mission desire to thank Miss Helen Gould for her beautiful act in remembering them in this, the most auspicious moment of her earthly career; and they unite in praying that the richest blessings of Almighty God may continually rest upon the married life of Mr. and Mrs. Finley J. Shepard."

Describes 200 Good Things to Eat at Close to One-Half Usual Prices

A million families will each now save $50 to $150 per year on what they eat. And they will live as well or better than before! All because of a wonderful book, now ready for mailing, which describes and in many cases pictures some 200 groceries of best quality at lower than wholesale prices, and over 500 other household supplies at actual factory prices.

Our groceries are sold to you at the prices your grocer pays his wholesaler. Many of them are sold to you for less—because we handle them in larger quantities than most wholesalers and consequently can buy closer and offer them at smaller margin of profit. Our other household supplies (there are fully 500 of them) are sold to you at the actual factory prices, which are just about half the usual store prices.

No wife or husband who cares to save will lose a moment in getting this Cut Price Book. It is not mailed broadcast, but it is free to the head of any family that asks for it.

Our Prices Do Their Own Talking

The prices quoted in this daring book speak for themselves. They reveal at a moment's glance a sheer fall of 15 to 60 per cent below usual prices.

To prove that there's no lessening of quality, we permit one-half of any package to be used as a test, wholly at our risk. If you think the goods are not A1 quality, return what's left and we will refund all your money, freight cost and everything.

We further guarantee prompt, safe delivery and a plan which makes freight-charges amount to practically nothing, no matter where you live.

Remember, this guarantee is given by Larkin Co., manufacturers of established national reputation. In business 37 years. Over 2,000,000 customers.

Why Can We Cut Prices

Why can we? Because we sell direct to you, the consumer, and save you the retailers' profits and expenses. Because we, ourselves, manufacture most of the articles we offer, or handle them in such immense quantities that their cost is reduced to rock-bottom. Because we are dependent for our profit on the number of orders we receive, not on the size of each, and therefore are content with the smallest margin of profit possible on each individual order.

With our tremendous buying power—created by our two million and more customers—few if any can obtain such advantageous prices on raw materials as we. And you are the ones to profit—you are the ones who get the benefit of our unrivalled, low factory and near-factory prices.

Questions and Answers

S. D. G., Ovid, N. Y. What do you understand by "The sun shall not smite thee by day nor the moon by night"? Can the moon in Oriental countries bring an ill to a person?

The passage in Ps. 121: 6 means that they will not be afflicted either with intense heat or severe cold. Further, it has often been asserted that the moon produced a hurtful effect on those who slept under its beams. The whole passage means that by day and night God's people will be under his protecting care, and no real and lasting hurt shall befall them.

R. S., Albuquerque, N. M. 1. How many Indians in the United States? 2. What State has the largest Indian population?

1. There are 327,348. 2. Oklahoma, 117,444.

Reader, Hoboken, N. J. There is nowhere in Scripture foundation for the statement that God puts away (or forgives) the sin in question only once—that he will not forgive a second offense. He says: "Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be white as snow." Jesus himself assures us that the sinner who comes to him truly repentant, seeking forgiveness, he will not "cast out." This, however, does not encourage or justify continuance in sin, but the reverse, for the soul that abides in sin, and who, knowing the light, wilfully rejects the offer of mercy and pardon, is in a truly perilous state. "The soul that sinneth, it shall die." Thinking continually of one's sin and abhorring it, proves that the Spirit is striving to win us to true repentance and forgiveness.

B. F. M., Topeka, Kan. What is the most northerly port in the world?

Hammerfest in Norway. It is situated a little over 70 degrees north latitude. It has a very good harbor. Many visit this place to observe the midnight sun, which can be seen there from the middle of May to the last of July.

R. B. C., Jefferson, Ky. What causes the moon to disappear altogether at times and then reappear, as it were, in sections until the full moon, when she gradually disappears again until new moon?

The phases of the moon are owing to her relation to the earth and sun. She is only an opaque body giving no light, but simply reflecting the light of the sun, therefore we can only see that hemisphere of her surface which happens to be illuminated and of this hemisphere only that portion which happens to be turned towards the earth. When the moon is between the earth and sun (at new moon) the dark side is then presented directly towards us and the moon is entirely invisible. A week later, at the end of the first quarter, half of the illuminated hemisphere is visible, just as it is a week after the full. Between the new moon and the half-moon, during the first and last quarters of the lunation, we see less than half of the illuminated portion and then have the "crescent" phase. Between half-moon and the full moon, during the second and third quarters of the lunation, we see more than half of the moon's illuminated side and have what is called the "gibbous" phase.

S. M. K., Kalamazoo, Mich. Do any mammals come from eggs?

Yes; two strange animals of Australia, the ant-eater (echidna) and the platypus or duck-bill (ornithorhynchus).

S. A., Westpoint, Ind. Melchizedek was the king of Salem, the name meaning "righteous king." He was high priest as well as monarch, and is cited in the Gospels as a type of regal-priesthood which was higher than that of Aaron, and to which the Messiah would belong. Early Christian writers, as well as Jewish authors, have discussed this mysterious personage and formed different conclusions concerning him; some holding that he was no other than Shem, one of the sons of Noah; another that he was an angel, and still others that he was an incarnation of Christ. None of these opinions is authorized in Scripture. Heb. 7: 3 says that he was like unto the Son of God; in other words, a type of Christ. The account in Heb. 7 is interpreted as meaning either that his origin was obscure, or at all events had not been divulged; yet for his eminent virtues and righteousness and the holiness of his life, he had been honored as no other man.

J. W. H., Quincy, Mich. 1 Please explain John 17: 17. Does not I. Cor. 7: 14 come in connection with the former verse? 2. Is Paul's teaching as essential as that of Jesus? 3. Please explain the "witness of the Spirit."

1. "Sanctify" here means to consecrate. It is more than mere protection from the element of sin surrounding them that is asked, it is positive, and asks the advancement and completion of their sanctification already begun through the medium of God's revealed truth—his Word. The passage in John has no direct connection with or bearing on that in I Cor., which deals with the spiritual relationship in marriage. 2. Though esteemed the greatest of

Only Half An Hour From Town

MODERN farmers have ceased to measure distances by miles. Minutes serve instead. "We are just half an hour from town," says a farmer who lives eight miles out but owns an International Commercial Car. "Loaded or unloaded, the time is about the same. I went to town last spring, starting half an hour after my next neighbor went by my gate with his team, and I passed him just where the main street paving begins. His wagon was empty. I took in nearly a thousand pounds of garden truck. No more road horses for me. Why we visit every friend within thirty miles, attend demonstrations, hear lectures, see entertainments, have a better time in every way since I bought an

The Car That Has Made Its Way by the Way It's Made

Every day you run an International Commercial Car you will find it more useful to you. You make the trips you used to neglect, because you did not want to take the horses from their work. It can be used in all seasons when the road is passable to horses. The wheels are high enough to give ample road clearance. Solid tires give good traction and eliminate many tire troubles. The engine is simple and powerful. Fuel and oil cost less than the feed for a horse, while the car will do from two to four times as much work.

It will pay you in many ways to know all about the International Commercial Car. A letter brings full particulars with many interesting facts and figures.

the apostles, Paul had a very humble opinion of the value of his own labors. See 1 Cor. 9. He himself would have shuddered at any attempt to compare his teachings with those of the Master, and however much we may appreciate his magnificent talents and his intense zeal, it cannot be said that there is any basis on which to establish such a comparison as you suggest. 3. The "witness of the Spirit" is the inward assurance which the believer enjoys of his filial relation to God, namely, that the Holy Spirit witnesses to and with his spirit that he is a child of God, and that his sins are forgiven. The immediate results of this witness of the Spirit are set forth in Gal. 5: 22, 23.

M. A. O., Boone's Path, Va. Please explain Phil. 2: 12, 13.

There is no contradiction in these verses. It is very true that we must work out our own salvation; and it is equally true that it is God who worketh in us. A certain part is ours to do, which God cannot do for us; another part is God's to do, which we cannot do for him. In the first place we must do the believing. Mr. Moody used to tell how he prayed for faith until he noticed the passage: "Faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the Word of God." Rom. 10: 17. God has given the Word; we must do the believing. Again, God gives us the power, but we must use it. God may give his Spirit to enable a Christian to testify or to preach, but, the Christian must use his lips and tongue and voice. God dwells in us and works in us and we have his power; but by using his power and accepting his help we increase our capacity for more, we gain mental, spiritual and physical strength and skill for our work. Our bodily life bears a perfect analogy to the spiritual life in this respect; God starts our hearts beating and keeps bestowing the gift of life. In this sense he dwells and works in us. But we must work and exercise that we may grow stronger and more efficient and accomplish the work we find to do.

Subscriber, Newton, N. J. There is no such passage in the Bible, the nearest approach to it being James 4: 4, "The friendship of the world is enmity with God." We do not know where they can be found.

J. W. D., Nantic, Conn. We do not regard the books you mention as authoritative. True Christians can look to the future, and even to death itself, without fear. Living or dying, they are the Lord's and safe in his keeping, here and hereafter.

New England Subscriber. The passage in Isa. 45: 7 relates to physical and not moral evil, as may be seen from the preceding and subsequent verses. Physical evil is any discord or disturbance in the order of matter, whereas moral evil is the negation of good. See James 1: 13.

Subscriber, Albia, Iowa. Scripture tells us that there is none perfect save God. Even the angels are not perfect. Human perfection is impossible in this life, although it is our duty to strive toward perfection. While one may be said to be "a perfect man," the term can only be used in a comparative sense.

Old Subscriber, New York. The case described in your letter is a very difficult one, and must be handled with great tact and discretion. It would be well to send for Mrs. X and assure her first of your friendliest intention. Then point out to her the danger of such a course as you have discovered. Strive to awaken her conscience to the necessity of doing right. In doing this you will have fulfilled your duty as a Christian. You have given the warning, and if you do it earnestly, and impress her with your sincerity, it will very likely be effective.

W. A. H., Sophia, Okla. The passage to which you refer can be found in Rev. 14: 20. The prophet is describing the fate which overtakes the apostate world and its punishment by the avenging "armies of heaven." Some commentators hold that the scene is laid in the Valley of Kedron between Jerusalem and the Mount of Olives and that the torrent of the stream would be discolored with blood for sixteen hundred furlongs. This accords with Joel's prophecy that the valley of Jehosaphat is to be the scene of the overthrow of the Anti-Christian foe.

Five Million Children

Go to School, Each School-Day Morning, on a Dish of Quaker Oats.

And other millions don't.

Side by side they work and play, learn, develop and compete.

Side by side, in later years, they face the world's big problems.

One gets the utmost in energy-food. The next one something less.

One gets an abundance of protein, phosphorus and lecithin. Another, less or none.

One is fed on a food that develops the thyroid, the gland which controls brain development. Another lacks that food.

Which of those children, in your estimation, has the better chance?

Quaker Oats

The World's Delicious Breakfast—And Its Supper, Too

The Quaker Oats children get, in addition, the world's favorite cereal dish.

So superior, so widely known, that hosts of people send ten thousand miles to get it.

So matchless in flavor that a thousand million dishes are now needed to supply one winter's wants.

Even ordinary oats, prepared without skill, form a dish which no other grain can rival.

The insidious flavor, the smoothness and richness, belong to no other grain foods.

And scientists and layman, workers and thinkers, all agree on the help which one gets from oatmeal.

But Quaker Oats gives you these things at their maximum.

These are selected oats, picked out by 62 siftings.

From a bushel of oats we get, on the average, only 10 pounds of Quaker.

Those are the choice oats—the rich, plump grains—just the cream of the crops in quality and flavor.

We bring them to you in the form of flakes—big, luscious, clean and sterilized by heat.

We bring them in cleanly packages—just these choice, selected grains.

And the cost, despite all this selection, is but one-half cent per dish. That's because the grains discarded are used in other ways.

That's why millions and millions, all the world over, demand Quaker Oats for their tables.

Our Modest Output

By R. E. Olds, Designer

After 26 years, and perhaps a record success, I am building but 50 cars daily.

Men ask, Why this modest output?

Why aren't you today in the 40,000 class, with all this fame, all this experience, and with such a car as Reo the Fifth?

Not for Lack of Orders

It isn't due to any lack of demand. There were times last year when orders from users ran five times our factory output.

For months at a time we were thousands of cars behind on immediate shipments.

And the same condition will repeat itself. We know that now. In April and May there will be five buyers for every car, no doubt.

But here's the other side:

The Other Side

Our present output, with this model factory, brings the cost of production down to the minimum.

If I built two or three models the cost would increase by some 20 per cent, I figure.

A larger output would make impossible such supervision as this car gets. I can't find the men to give it.

And hurrying men, or working nights, would lead to oversights

Here's What We Do

Each lot of steel is analyzed twice, before and after treating.

Gears are tested in a crushing machine, to prove that each tooth will stand 75,000 pounds.

We use special springs, made from the center one-third of the finest steel ingots. And those springs are tested for 100,000 vibrations.

We use a $75 magneto to stand the tests which we require of that.

Everything is discarded—materials or parts—which shows the least shortcoming.

Parts are ground over and over to get utter exactness. Tests and inspections are carried here to the very last extreme.

Each engine, for instance, is tested 48 hours—20 hours on blocks, 28 hours in the chassis. There are five long tests, covering every requirement.

Where Savings Go

We have, as I say, ideal factory efficiency. Engineers from everywhere come here to inspect it.

I have spent years and years in perfecting it, and I cannot apply it to a larger production.

We build only one model. We build all our own parts. We make no material changes, for our car is right. So our tools and machinery last year after year.

We save in these ways some $200 per car. It is that saving which pays for all this care and inspection. And it pays for things like these:

Costly Extremes

We give to each part a big margin of safety. In fact, each part is built to stand the tests for a 45 h.p. car.

We use 15 roller bearings—11 of them Timkens—where the usual ball bearings would cost one-fifth as much.

We use in each car 190 drop forgings, at twice the average cost of steel castings. We do this to make flaws impossible.

We equip the car with oversize tires—34 x 4. The cost is about $60 per car over tires which some call sufficient on a car of this weight. But the cost comes back to you over and over in the lower tire upkeep.

We use a centrifugal pump.
We use 14-inch brake drums.
We use 2-inch, 7-leaf springs.

Then note the costly finish. Each body gets 17 coats.

The deep upholstering is of genuine leather, filled with the best curled hair.

Every detail shows the final touch. The electric side lights are set in the dash. And even the engine is nickel-trimmed.

All for $1,095

To build a car like this, inside and outside, for $1,095, is an amazing achievement.

It would be to me an impossibility on a much larger production. And a lesser car would not be wanted when men found it out.

That's why I limit my output.

It is also the reason why men want more cars than I can build.

The $100 Control

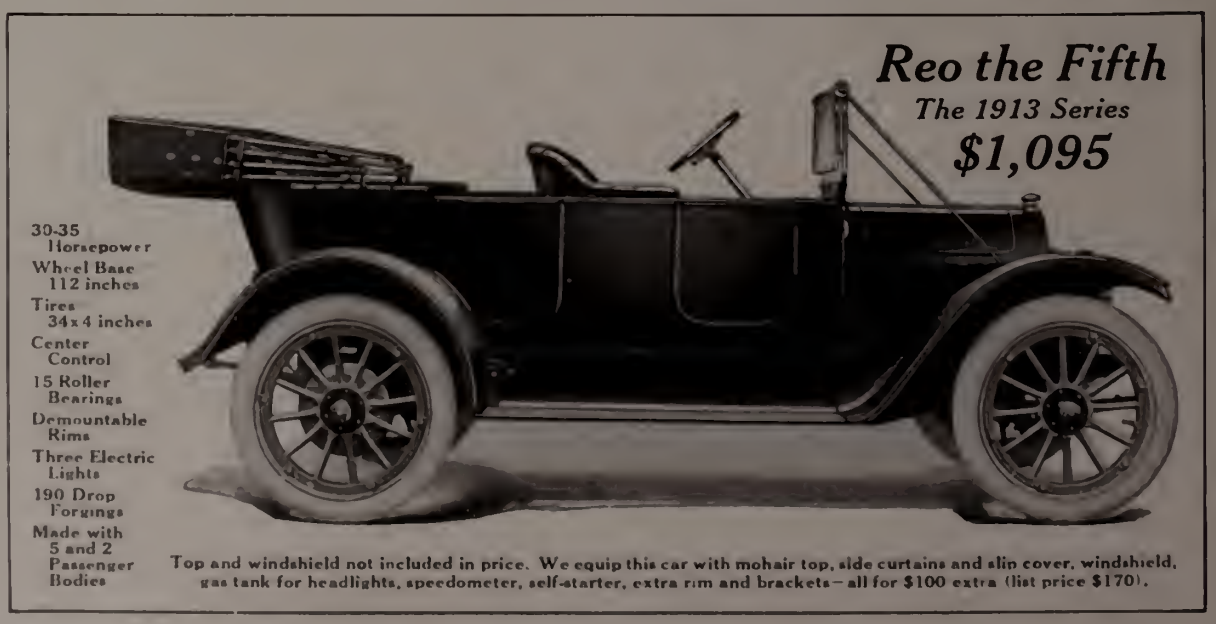
I believe men would pay $100 extra for the center control in this Reo the Fifth. Yet it adds not one cent to the cost.

All the gear shifting is done by one light handle, entirely out of the way. It is done by moving this handle only three inches in each of four directions. It's as simple as moving the spark lever.

No reaching—no levers in the way. Both brakes are operated by foot pedals. Both the front doors are clear.

This arrangement permits of right-hand control, combined with left-side drive. And that is regarded as an essential in a car that's up to date.

A thousand dealers handle Reo the Fifth. Write for our 1913 catalog, and the nearest dealer's address. Then see him, please, before the April rush.



Top and windshield not included in price. We equip this car with mohair top, side curtains and slip cover, windshield, gas tank for headlights, speedometer, self-starter, extra rim and brackets—all for $100 extra (list price $170).

The Social Motive: Love*

Epworth League Topic

LOVE is the strongest, strangest, most precious thing in the world. A few years ago a scientist wrote a book called The Greatest Thing in the Word. But the greatest thing was not science but love. He argued his case from a brief submitted nineteen centuries earlier by another scholar, named Paul, who declared that there were three abiding things, and of the three the greatest was love. The man who has gone unchallenged as the world's wisest man, with the exception of the Teacher who was more than man. wrote centuries before that: "Love is strong as death. Many waters cannot quench love, neither can the floods drown it." And one has read only a few pages in the first book of the Bible before one finds this delicate epitome of a real love story: "And Jacob served seven years for Rachel; and they seemed unto him but a few days, for the love he had to her." Poets, historians, tellers of tales, philosophers and scientists gather at last about the feet of the Galilean Teacher and reply when he announces that the greatest commandment is to love God, and the second greatest to love one's neighbor: "Well, Master, thou hast said the truth."

The problem for our daily living is to apply this motive of love to the actual work we have to do, and make it reach the people we have to help and serve. A telephone girl, for instance, how she can annoy and hinder multitudes of busy men who have important work to do, if she really does not care to be helpful! How she can facilitate their work if she really has the spirit of cheerful helpfulness! A railway conductor or guard—if he is sullen and careless, he may fail to give people the direction they need, or may even mislead them! All work is illuminated and made easier, more delightful, more efficient, if the element of brotherly love can be introduced.

The plan of Jesus is very wonderful, very perfect. He insists, first of all, that we love him, that we actually care for him, definitely, personally, warmly. In loving him like that we are fulfilling the first and greatest commandment, to love God, for he is God. Then he distinctly says that we are to regard our neighbor as representing himself, and treat our neighbor as we would treat him if he were here.

That makes life very rich and very strong. The emotion of love is limited by nature to a few; we love the home circle and the close circle of friends. Too often we fail to get beyond the position of that fictitious farmer, who is said to have used this grace at meals:

> Lord, bless me and my wife,
> My son John and his wife;
> Us four—and no more.

Of course no farmer ever did say that; but if we are not careful we shall find ourselves living something like that. Jesus cares for everybody. He died for everybody. And he asks us to care for people as he cares for them; to serve them as he served them when he was here; to bear their burdens and right their wrongs, and try to meet their needs, and bring them salvation and cheer and hope—because we love them.

THIRTY YEARS IN AFRICA

By the Great Missionary Explorer

DAVID LIVINGSTONE

We celebrate this year, on March 19, the one hundredth anniversary of the birth of David Livingstone, "The Pathfinder," who not only opened up the Dark Continent to the gaze of the world, but who carried the light of Christianity into the Dark Continent.

"Anywher provided it be Forward"

"Fear God and Work Hard"

"Do you carry out the work I have begun. I leave it to you"

THERE has just been published a new David Livingstone, by C. Silvester Horne, M.D. He says in his preface to the book: "It is only forty years since his body was carried by faithful hands from the center of Africa to the coast that he might be buried among his peers in Westminster Abbey. Through every decade his fame greatens. Livingstone is greatest not as a scientist nor as an explorer, but as a man and a missionary." Few of us realize to-day the tremendous effect on the African Slave Trade made by the disclosures which Livingstone gave to the world. During his thirty years' missionary work in Africa he crossed and recrossed Africa three different times and penetrated regions never before visited by a white man. The story of his struggles and achievements reads more like fiction than fact. We believe this new David Livingstone by C. Silvester Horne to be the most popular and the most properly appreciative life of Livingstone ever written.

Easter Missionary Program

Missionary societies and churches of every denomination should co-operate in having a Livingstone Centenary Program, one either in combination with the regular Easter services on Sunday, March 23, or especially on the anniversary date, March 19. For those not already supplied we have prepared and printed an eight-page concert program containing the words and music of songs and hymns appropriate to the occasion. Interspersed with the music are Responsive Readings, Bible Lessons, Livingstone's Consecration Hymn, a short address on the life of David Livingstone, and indicated readings from the most thrilling passages of Horne's David Livingstone. First program to be had only in connection with special offers described below. Additional programs in lots of ten or more, postpaid, at one cent each.

Easter Post Cards

We have been fortunate in being able to secure a special lot of very fine Easter Post Cards, so that we are able to make up packages each containing ten cards of distinct and separate designs in full color and with silver and gold decorations. There are some of them with Easter Scripture verses, some of them with Easter greetings. All of them are in soft pastel color, dainty, and in entire keeping with the spirit of the season. These post cards are to be given away.

Our Special Easter Missionary Offer

We will send a bound copy of "David Livingstone," by Horne, one copy of the Easter Program, 10 Easter Post Cards, postpaid, together with a year's subscription to The Christian Herald and The Christian Herald Almanac for 1913, all for only $2.00

Or, to any old subscriber who will send us one NEW eight months' subscription to The Christian Herald and Almanac (remitting $1.00 with order), we will send a bound copy of "David Livingstone," one Easter Missionary Program, and 10 Easter Post Cards . . . . FREE

Livingstone and His Work

was put to work in a factory at the age of ten, where he labored fourteen hours a day, though he still found time for study after working hours. He entered Glasgow University, earning enough at his work in summer to pay for his winter schooling. At about this time he was converted, and soon after determined to become a missionary. Hearing, from Dr. Robert Moffat, home on furlough from Africa, of the great need of the Gospel in the Dark Continent, he chose that land for his field. In 1840, having received a medical license and been ordained a missionary, he sailed, on December 8, for South Africa.

The story of David Livingstone's life in Africa is one of courage, hardship, patience, skill, prayer, faith, honor, and unfailing kindness. His journeys were so prodigious, his discoveries so important, that when he first returned to England in 1856, he was greeted with extraordinary acclaim. Statesmen and scholars, as well as leaders of the church, joined with the populace in praising and honoring him. He returned to Africa and only once more visited England before his great work in the Dark Continent was done, and the natives who were with him at the end buried his heart under the trees of Chitambo's village before they started forth on their love task of bearing his worn body one thousand miles to the coast to be carried thence to England. He was buried among Great Britain's statesmen, soldiers, saints, poets and scholars in Westminster Abbey, as "Missionary, Traveler, Philanthropist."

For further details of Livingstone and his work see the first general article in this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and one of the articles on the editorial page.

The Medical Missionary*

Christian Endeavor Topic

EVER since the Healer of Galilee "went about doing good," healing the diseases of the people, opening the eyes of the blind and unstopping deaf ears, the ministry of healing has been a definite part of the work of the church he founded. In innumerable instances the way to the hearts of unevangelized people has been through the skill of the consecrated missionary doctor.

The work of the medical missionary has been a particularly promising and fruitful field for consecrated young women. The Western woman doctor has had privileges of entering palaces and other homes and carrying the Gospel to the isolated women of those strange countries, who would never receive the Gospel unless the heart and tongue of a woman carry it.

In our Scripture lesson the healing power given was evidently miraculous. The gift of healing as the Master healed, without the aid of natural means, was given to the Apostes. The New Testament teaches clearly that the power of healing by faith was to remain in the church, and many undoubtedly possess it, even yet. Tennyson is surely right:

> More things are wrought by prayer
> Than this world dreams of.

There seems no reason whatever for thinking that the two forms of healing need to be always separated. We are asked to pray and believe after we have used all our human power and means. Many a spiritually minded doctor prays earnestly as he labors, and his labors help, not hinder, the answer to his prayers.

Just now the world is making preparations to celebrate the hundredth anniversary of the birth of the world's greatest medical missionary. Read the sketch of Livingstone in the Baptist Young People's Lesson for this week, and also in the article and editorial appearing on other pages of this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

)AVID LIVINGSTONE—SAINT AND PIONEER

HERO, EXPLORER, AND MISSIONARY WHOSE CENTENARY IS BEING CELEBRATED

TO SOME kinds of people David Livingstone would be incomprehensible. So many of the things they consider valueless he strove for unto the death. So many of the things ey care for greatly he seemed utterly to despise. ime, for instance. It almost annoyed him.

C. Silvester Horne, in his admirabe book, David vingstone, relates the story of the missionary aveler's conduct at a town in England where an dience had gathered to hear him speak: "Two al orators introduced the proceedings with eeches magnifying Livingstone's achievements. hen he rose to his feet he had an overwhelming ception, but, turning straight to a large map, he id in a singularly cold, hard voice: 'If you want know the truth about the river system of Cen- al Africa, be good enough to look at this map.'" This map! That was what he cared about, for e map was Africa, and for Africa he lived id died.

As for money, after making a tedious and fficult voyage from Africa to Bombay to dis- se of a steamer he owned, which had cost 3,000, selling her for £2,600, and depositing ie money in an Indian bank which failed com- etely a few weeks later, he said: "The whole the money she cost was dedicated to the reat cause for which she was built. We are ot responsible for results." Dr. Horne says him, in what is perhaps a bit of justifiable yperbole: "He cared for money less than any ian."

But some of the things he forsook he really id care for. He loved his father and mother, ut he left them to go to Africa with the Gos- el. In the little cottage at Blantyre the amily read together on the morning he went way the 121st Psalm, whose words held prom- ses strangely full of comfort for the son who as going forth and the friends to be left be- ind: "He that keepeth Israel shall neither lumber nor sleep. The Lord is thy keeper; the ord is thy shade upon thy right hand. The un shall not smite thee by day, nor the moon y night. The Lord shall preserve thee from ll evil; he shall preserve thy soul. The Lord hall preserve thy going out and thy coming n from this time forth and even forevermore."

Later when in Africa he had married Miss Mary Moffat, daughter of the Robert Moffat whose words had led him to the Dark Conti- ent, he had to be separated from her and from he children long years at a time. He sent hem back to England, promising to follow in wo years. But when the two years were nore than up, he stood on the western shore of Africa, after he had made his amazing journey rom coast to coast, and watched the Forerun- ner steam off to England without him, because e believed a deeper duty called him to lead afely home again the natives who had accompa- ied him across the wild continent. In this in- stance his fidelity to the deepest duty saved him rom a greater danger than the danger of the jun- gle and from almost certain death, for the Fore- runner went down on that voyage and all hands but one were lost. Later, when his wife and their youngest son had returned with him to Africa but had to turn back because of ill health while he went on, he wrote: "It was bitter parting with my wife; like tearing the heart out of one."

He missed, also, the comforts of civilization while he was isolating himself in the African wil- dernesses. He liked clean, fresh clothes and the countless trifles that go to make life smooth and tolerable for gentle natures like his. But as the years passed he knew less and less of these things. Every fresh loss and deprivation were taken with his unfailing patience and courage. Quite early in his African experiences a meager house he had built and equipped for himself and his young wife was sacked and pillaged by the Boers. He wrote in his diary when he heard of the loss: "We shall move more easily now that we are lightened of our furniture. They have taken away our sofa. I never had a good rest on it. We had only got it ready when we left. Well, they can't have taken away all the stones. We shall have a seat in spite of them, and that, too, with a merry heart which doeth good like a medicine."

To the last he endured privation and distress like a true soldier and a true saint. Floundering through the Chambezé bogs, fever-stricken, with ulcered feet, aged, pain-racked, in the drenching rain, he sticks to his great motto, "Forward!" Unable to walk at last, his men put his feeble body in a rude litter, and carry him, but it is still "'Forward!" though the rain is ceaseless and the hand of death is on him. They reach Chitambo's village. While he lies in the rain his men build him a hut in which to die. But he will not die in his bed. They know he cannot move; but he does move. And alone in the night he struggles out of bed and kneels upon the ground. And so they find him—dead.

Who is this man and why are nations vying with one another to celebrate the one hundredth anniversary of his birth? In what regards is the world different than if he had remained at home, a comfortable Scotch minister or doctor, instead of stumbling all his life through the high grasses and the deep mud of Africa with wild beasts and deadly fevers and uncertain savages and cunning slave-dealers threatening him as he went? The difference is that Africa is a known rather than an unknown land, that hundreds of faithful missionaries have followed in his steps, and that the abominations of the slave trade are at an end. Of course, in none of these magnificent achievements does he stand alone. But his part in all three of them may be said to be greater than that of any other, with the exception, in the case of slavery's end, of Abraham Lincoln. Livingstone himself said that it was Mrs. Stowe who put an end to slavery in America. One expects an encyclopedia to be conservative, and of all the encyclopedias none is more conservative than the great Britannica. And this is its estimate of the achievements of David Livingstone: "No single African explorer has ever done so much for African geography as Livingstone during his thirty years' work. His travels covered one-third of the continent, extending from the Cape to near the equator, and from the Atlantic to the Indian Ocean. But the direct gains to geography and science are perhaps not the greatest results of Livingstone's journeys. He conceived, developed and carried out to success a noble and many-sided purpose, with an unflinching and self-sacrificing energy and courage that entitle him to take rank among the great and strong who, single-handed, have been able materially to influence human progress and the advancement of knowledge. His example and his death have acted like an inspiration, filling Africa with an army of explorers and missionaries, and raising in Europe so powerful a feeling against the slave trade that it may be considered as having received its death blow." The London Missionary Society, in sending out its invitation to its friends and supporters to join in celebrating the hundredth anniversary of Livingstone's birth, declares: "In the history of modern missions there is no greater name than that of David Livingstone. The memory of his life and character will ever be a precious heritage of the Christian Church. His life's work in opening up Africa led directly to the suppression of the slave trade, and to the entrance of Western civilization and the Christian religion into the remotest recesses of the Dark Continent."

In the United States the celebration of the Livingstone Centenary has been chiefly under the direction of the Missionary Education Movement. The Foreign Missions Council of North America, on January 12, 1912, passed a resolution recommending that each missionary board take steps to celebrate the Centenary and requesting the Missionary Education Movement to facilitate the celebration. A campaign of reading and preparation has been for some time under way, biographies of Livingstone have been widely circulated, studies of Africa have been assigned to the various young people's societies, and programs issued for the actual celebration of the centenary. Religious newspapers are planning to issue special Livingstone numbers. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is combining its Lincoln and Livingstone numbers and is also providing a special program for churches, Sunday schools or young people's societies who plan to celebrate the hundredth birthday of this saint and pioneer. For the most part the celebration will take place on Easter, March 23, the Sunday following the great explorer's birthday, March 19.

Probably the two most dramatic incidents in the thrilling life of Livingstone were his escape from the teeth of a lion during the early years of his work in Africa, and his "discovery" by Stanley after he had been for several years lost to the world. The former event took place on one of his first tours into the interior. Serious depredations had been committed by lions in the neighborhood and he joined a lion hunt. Livingstone shot at one of the beasts from a distance of about thirty yards. While re-loading, the lion ran toward him, seized his shoulder and, in his own words, "growling horribly close to my ear, he shook me as a terrier dog does a rat." One of the natives rushed in and diverted the lion's attack. The animal bit his thigh, then turned upon another man, taking him also by the shoulder. At this instant the shots that had reached him previously took effect, and he fell dead. Livingstone's arm was "crushed into splinters" and his flesh bore the marks of eleven of the lion's teeth. His arm never fully regained its powers, and it was by the misshapen bone that his body was positively identified in England after the

The Monastery of St. Paul on Mount Athos

A FORTRESS OF EASTERN CHRISTIANITY

ON THE southern side of Macedonia is an irregular peninsula called Chalcidice, from which jut out into the Ægean Sea three bold promontories known as Cassandra, Longos and Athos. The last named is famous as being the seat of the most remarkable monastic community in the world, that of the monks of Mount Athos or the Holy Mountain, which may be styled the very center of the Eastern Church, the indomitable Christian fortress which has never bowed to the infidel, never yielded the slightest of its religious convictions, never feared the force of earthly might, but quietly, peacefully, yet grimly and determinedly has upheld its every right in the face of powerful influences, and has preserved its proud independence during more than three hundred years of Moslem sway.

At the present time an added interest attaches to this stronghold of Eastern Christianity in view of the rumor that it will soon be declared an independent church republic, free from domination by any of the powers, though under the protectorate of the Orthodox Balkan States. While this rumor is not yet officially confirmed, there is reason to believe that it rests on good foundation and that such a republic may shortly be proclaimed, the head of which shall be the Ecumenical Patriarch, who has so long been the head of the government of the Orthodox Church in the Near East, and that a military force shall be raised to protect the interests and safeguard the rights of the monkish commonwealth.

When it is taken into consideration that more than one hundred millions of Christians belong to the Holy Orthodox Eastern Church, and that this vast number look to Athos in much the same way as the Catholics look to Rome, it can readily be inferred that it is a place of the utmost importance to this great branch of the Christian world.

Mount Athos, or the Holy Mountain, is but a designative term. A large area is dotted with churches, chapels, cloisters, niches, and cenobitical apartments. In all there are about twenty monasteries, forming the monastic republic of the Holy Mountain. These establishments commence some twenty miles from where the promontory juts into the Ægean.

The origin of this ecclesiastical state is lost in the obscurity of the centuries. When the hermits first gathered themselves into monasteries and chose this place for their purposes is a matter of uncertainty. Some authorities will have it that the first religious houses of Athos were established by the great Constantine. There is little to substantiate this, yet there are evidences enough to show that the hermits have been in the place for more than a thousand years.

Strange vicissitudes have befallen this wonderful community from time to time. The Latin conquerors of Constantinople pillaged the monasteries in the thirteenth century, but succeeding Greek emperors more than made up for the spoliations and established more firmly in its citadel the brotherhood. Passing from the jurisdiction of the Christian emperors to that of the Ottomans, Athos alone preserved its self-government and its ancient privileges when all the rest of the Byzantine Empire was crushed beneath the tread of conquering infidels.

The War of Independence at the beginning of the last century thrust a very heavy burden on the monasteries, and much of their territory was confiscated by Greece after the latter had gained independence, and also by the Roumanian provinces, with the result that the hermits became almost bankrupt beneath their misfortunes; but they held themselves together with a grim tenacity, and finally succeeded in overcoming their difficulties. At the present time the community seems to have recovered all the losses of the past and is not only gaining in numbers but adding to its establishments and increasing its material property as well.

The first, and perhaps the foremost, of the monasteries of these secluded hermits, who, by the way, never have allowed womankind to enter the precincts of their grounds, much less the sacred enclosures of their conventicles, is on Vatopedi, a hill rising from the sea and commanding a splendid view of the historic surroundings, including the far-famed islands of the Ægean. Here is a vast assemblage of monastic buildings surrounded by great walls. These buildings cover an area of four acres and include no less than sixteen churches. Of course many of them are mere chapels, but still they exhibit church characteristics in the way of interior divisions, domes and roofs. They differ very materially from our edifices. Each is divided into three principal parts, exterior and interior vestibule, nave, and bema or sanctuary. On each side of this sanctuary is a small chapel. Both the exterior and interior vestibules are often merged in what is called the narthex. Each of the divisions has a symbolical significance, the bema representing the Holy of Holies, the nave the court of the Jews, and the narthex the court of the Gentiles. The interiors are often covered with valuable frescoes of Scriptural and historical subjects. Mou faithful natives had carried it a thousand miles to the coast so that it might be sent by ship to England.

The Stanley episode is so well known that it need be mentioned but briefly. Livingstone, weary, lonely and ill, returned to Ujiji after one of his most perilous and arduous tours, during which the slave traders had again and again tried to kill him. He records that when he reached Ujiji he was "a mere ruckle of bones." A few days later his servant Susi came running toward him with the news that an Englishman was approaching. It was Stanley with his caravan, flying the American flag. James Gordon Bennett had sent him to Africa to find Livingstone, and after great privations and perils his search was rewarded and his long journey at an end. Stanley bore for the fatigued and desolate missionary supplies and comforts, but he could not induce him to return. Parents and wife were dead. Africa still held some secrets that he yearned to solve. He would not leave till his work was done. The two explorers spent some months journeying together, then Stanley returned to civilization while Livingstone turned his face again toward the heart of the Dark Continent to labor for another year—and to die.

Of all the tributes to Livingstone none is more beautiful than these lines from Punch:

He knew not that the trumpet he had blown
Out of the darkness of that dismal land
Had reached and roused an army of its own
To strike the chains from the slave's fettered hand.

Now, we believe, he knows, sees all is well;
How God had stayed his will and shaped his way,
To bring the light to those that darkling dwell
With gains that life's devotion will repay.

Open the Abbey doors and bear him in
To sleep with king and statesman, chief and sage,
The missionary come of weaver-kin,
But great by work that brooks no lower wage

He needs no epitaph to guard a name
Which men shall prize while worthy work is known;
He lived and died for good—be that his fame:
Let marble crumble! This is LIVINGSTONE

"MOTHERS' BOYS" WHO GO WRONG

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

COLD and damp the night wind blew along the Bowery, so that men and women drew their ragged garments closer, and hurried as if to escape its icy breath. Little children with pinched faces and wise eyes flattened their noses against the windows of the brightly lighted, tawdry stores. A man in a clown suit proclaimed the wonders of a marvelous side-show to a group of open-mouthed, curious people. And all about was hunger and cold and helplessness.

A bright light sent out its cheery glow from a building near by, and as we looked at the sign over the entrance we realized that we had reached our destination, for "Bowery Mission" stood out boldly to the sight of all passersby. As we opened the door and entered, we realized that the Mission was much larger than it seemed from the outside. It was positively bursting with good feeling. There was a sense of genial hospitality in the piles of rolls and the enormous coffee-boiler (to be used for the Bread Line) in the basement, no less than in the comfortable seats and warm air of the chapel. The meeting rooms on the floors overhead were filled with men of all kinds, whose voices could be heard like the drowsy hum of many bees.

Suddenly there was a stillness, and from the direction of the chapel a deep, clear voice began to read in an old familiar prayer. And the words were taken up by many rough, cracked voices, so we knew that the meeting had opened. Then the piano began the soft prelude to a hymn, and under cover of the music we slipped quietly into our seats.

Men were everywhere. Only once before had I seen so many men alone, without any women, and that was at a college entertainment. As I compared the two scenes, a great sorrow rose up in my heart; for in the one, they had all been strong, young men with promise of success before them—happy, smiling, and boyish—while here before me sat men, some, of course, young yet not boyish, but men mostly with gray hair and threadbare coats; men with hopeless eyes and sad mouths. For they were outcasts and failures! Yet one and all they rose and thundered out the sweet hymn of praise, perhaps more sincerely than the rich folks in their big uptown churches.

Now the heads were bowed again and the words of "Our Father" were repeated softly from the platform. And I wondered how many years ago those same outcast men had lisped these words at a mother's knee. The "Amen" sounded presently, and as I raised my head and looked over the sea of faces, a strange thought came to me. Every man there had once been a baby! A tiny red-faced baby in a white dress and woolen shoes; and at one time —long, long ago in some cases, only a short time ago in others—a mother's arms had enfolded the little form, while a mother's voice had whispered soft, tender phrases or crooned a queer little lullaby, maybe in a strange and foreign tongue.

An old man with a white beard and bleary, half-closed eyes nodded in a rear seat. His mother could not have been alive, for he was very old and dilapidated. And yet, when he was little and when he had cried for her, she had loved him more than her life.

A tall dark boy with reckless eyes was staring past the speaker to a sign whose legend read: "When did you last write home?" As he read, his eyes filled and he lowered his handsome head; for he saw her again, perhaps in a small country farmhouse, perhaps somewhere in a large city, but always waiting, always hoping that some day her boy would come back to her.

A man with a pugilistic face thrust out his under lip in scorn as the speaker talked of the country. He had probably been born and brought up on the Bowery; and his mother was probably now only a faint and comforting memory. He was the kind of man that thinks of his home occasionally and wants to reform; yet at one time a mother had wept over his baby shortcomings, and had kissed the black-and-blue spots to make them well.

Men slept quietly in their chairs, a score or more of them. They were not at all bored; they were only desperately, nauseatingly tired. For none of them had a home or a bed to sleep in, and perhaps in their dreams they were tiny bare-footed children again, pillowed in soft, comforting arms on a breezy vine-clad porch. Many of them slept with peaceful faces and happy smiles.

Earnest Faces at a Gospel Service in the Mission

A very young boy with the mark of suffering stamped indelibly on his fair, beardless face looked up at me with an unwinking stare. Any mother would have loved that boy, and would have taken pleasure in smoothing back the rumpled yellow hair from the troubled brow, and hearing a confession, no matter how bad. I hoped, yes, and prayed that he would go home to her. For sometimes the boys go home too late!

Once there was a boy, a good-looking, happy boy, who lived on a farm. He was perfectly contented until one day at the general store a flashily dressed drummer began to tell stories about the life and lights of the great White Way. The boy had listened amazed and astounded, and the drummer, noting his rapt listener, had said, not unkindly: "You, son, why don't you go to the city? Plenty of room for smart boys like you." The boy had not spoken to his parents about it at once, but in the next week he announced his intention of "making his fortune" in New York. His mother had cried and pleaded, but he had remained obdurate. Then one day he had packed up his grip, and, with his small savings in his pocket, had left for the large town.

I will not dwell on his life in the city. The inevitable happened. While his money lasted he had friends, kind words, happiness. When his money was gone, his friends melted away and he found himself penniless and homeless. He was ashamed to write to the country for funds. He made a little money at odd jobs, and then at last he took to drink. The careless farm boy vanished in the passing of the years, and in his place now stood a bowed, shifty-eyed man. One day this man wandered into a meeting. It was a revival meeting, and in a flash the man seemed to see his mother waiting for a word from her only son. With a sob in his voice he prayed for the first time in years; and he promised to go home.

It was not as easy to go home as it had seemed at the meeting. Railway tickets were hard to buy, and clothing cost money. But after many an inward struggle, the man put the city behind him and found himself again in the scenes of his childhood. The whole town seemed changed. The stores were larger, the church was freshly painted, and there were new stones in the old graveyard. But the man went blindly on. At last he reached the place where his home had been; but on the spot where the cheery little farmhouse had stood, only a few old bricks and a timber or two lay, while a sign on a nearby tree proclaimed, "This property for sale." And the man knew he had come too late.

But the pity of it is that there are hundreds, ay, thousands just like him!

Every State in the Union, and very nearly every country on the globe, is represented in the Bowery Mission. Many have sad memories of home which they cherish with a certain amount of pride. For they have gone away with high hopes and now will not return, broken and old. Many a sweet-faced mother waits for the postman's whistle every morning, with a hope that is half a fear in her heart. And many are the tears shed for the boy, her own baby, adrift in the big city.

The meeting was closing, and the piano struck up a melody as haunting and sweet as it is emotional. There were few dry eyes in the room, as the men, with faltering voices and flushed cheeks, joined in the refrain of "Where Is My Wandering Boy To-night?" Each man saw a picture—maybe a dim, blurred one—of a young mother kissing a sleepy little boy as she bent over his crib; or it may have been a more vivid one of an older woman weeping as a train steamed out of a station. And there were others who saw a picture of a gray-haired, bent little lady, dreaming before the fire, thinking of the boy who went away and of the letter that never came.

Somehow we got out into the street. There were two men standing before an iron gate: they were poor specimens of humanity, much more roughly clad, much more hopeless-looking than their brothers inside. As I looked over their heads, I saw a sign on the gate. It said: "Bread Line begins at one o'clock."

And it was only ten o'clock then!

Three more hours to wait for the steaming coffee and the huge roll. Those men were the most helpless class of all and the most wretched; yet they too had been little once, and maybe their mothers were still waiting for their knock at the door.

Ah! many an eye is dim with tears,
And many a head is gray;
And many there are who count the years
Since their boys went far away.

And many a prayer is breathed at night
To the Father up above,
For they ask him to guide the boys aright,
Who have gone from their sheltered love.

For a mother's heart is a mother's heart,
Wherever the child may roam:
And a mother's love will never part
From the boy who has left his home.

TOPICS OF INTEREST AT HOME AND ABROAD

—ACCORDING to the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, the nation's liquor bill for 1912 amounts to a total of $1,645,000,000. The total in gallons is 135,826,789, being an increase of 1,226,596 over 1911. Beer consumption, however, fell off 34,500,000 gallons.

—IN 1888, WILLIAM TAYLOR, Methodist Bishop of Africa, brought from Liberia "Little Diana," an African child, whom he called his "po' lil black lamb." The writer frequently met the bishop, and the latter invariably had something interesting to say about Diana. He carried her with him during a tour of lectures, and it was his custom to set her on the platform or bring her in on his shoulder (he was a man of giant stature and massive proportions, and she a mere ebony pigmy), and to say that there were "two million more little lambs in Africa just like her who needed shepherding." William Taylor has long ago passed to his reward. "Little Diana" is now a well-educated young woman, with an American college training, and she lately sailed from New York to be a missionary in Liberia, her native land. What a wonderful story Diana will have to tell her black brothers and sisters of God's goodness! She should be a successful missionary.

—CHARLES S. MELLEN, president of the New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad Company; Edson J. Chamberlain, president of the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada, and Alfred W. Smithers, chairman of the Board of Directors of the Grand Trunk, have been indicted by the Federal Grand Jury in New York, which is investigating the deal between the New Haven and the Grand Trunk roads. It has been charged that in return for traffic concessions, the latter road has abandoned its purpose of extending its lines to Providence, R. I., and Boston, and establishing steamship service between Providence and New York. This action was regarded by the Grand Jury as an agreement "in restraint of trade," and a violation of the Sherman Anti-Trust Law. President Mellen appeared before Judge Hough in the United States District Court in New York late in December, together with President Chamberlain. Each furnished bail to the amount of $10,000 to appear for trial.

—PRESIDENT-ELECT WILSON has expressed his desire to dispense with the customary inaugural ball. He has also intimated that during his administration the Marine Band will not be permitted to play questionable dance music, including the "turkey trot" and others of that class, at social functions. He does not believe in encouraging these dances, and holds that the national capital should set a good example for the rest of the country in this respect.

Unexpected Visitations of God

A Sermon

BY

Rev. Newell Dwight Hillis, D.D.*

TEXT: And when Jesus beheld the city he wept over it, and said, If thou hadst known, even thou, the day of thy visitation! Paraphrased from Luke 19: 41, 42 and 44

FROM the Mount of Olives Jesus looked out upon Jerusalem, with its temple and palaces, in the zenith of their splendor and the perfection of their beauty. He saw the people thronging the streets buying and selling, marrying and giving in marriage, all unconscious of the cloud, big with calamity, hanging above their heads. King Herod in his palace, the chief priest in his temple, saw no outer sign of the approaching retribution, and yet the time of visitation had fully come. There was a rotten palace, where a king lived like a pig in a sty; there was a rotten temple, where the "temple ring" rioted rather than feasted; there was a rotten court, a rotten camp, and a rotten people. Every crowded city during the fiery summer sends up foul gases and exhalations, that hold latent lightnings. And Jerusalem, with its sensuality and cruelty, its greed and oppression, carried within itself the beginning and the end of penalty and retribution. Every nation holds at least one epoch that illustrates this principle of self-retribution. Witness France in 1789. Never had Louis been so firmly established upon his throne. The French language was universal, the French court was most brilliant, the foreign guards most faithful. And yet to the king and queen the stroke of the revolution was a thunderbolt out of a blue sky, while for others the storm had been long overdue.

Witness China to-day. For centuries a handful of corrupt and cruel Manchus had imposed their rule upon nearly four hundred millions of peaceable Chinese. For fifty years the government had been a system of organized graft. One-half of all the taxes raised for roads, bridges, mails, railways, city government, had been diverted in the form of pensions to every Manchu family. In vain the diplomat, Sir Robert Hart, warned the Chinese throne. In vain the authors and educators lifted up their voices. Always the warnings have fallen on deaf ears. And now that judgment has come, there has been no wanton or arbitrary judgment pronounced; the retribution moved with the certainty of gravity as well as with the swiftness of the lightning. He who obeys the law of God finds the divine law resting upon his shoulders with the lightness of a gossamer thread. But he who disobeys God's law finds that law an iron fetter that weighs him down. Jesus saw revelry and frivolity in the streets below, and calamity impending from the heavens above. And he wept for the temple that would soon be a waste and the city to become a desolation.

The Sin of Dives

Consider how the unexpected visitation of God changes men who have set their heart on things material. One of the richest trees that ripen fruit in the Garden of Eden is the tree of property. God planted that tree and feeds its roots, and ripens the clusters of abundance for the children that look to him for daily bread. The love of property is as lawful and praiseworthy in the individual as it is necessary for the State. Society does well to honor him whose industry, prudence and economy keep his family from beggary, vice and shame. The love of property is one of the forces that hurl the chariot of the soul forward on life's highway. But what if a man who plants the tree of wealth should finally come to love the tree for its own sake? That is why the word for the miserable man is the word "miser." Having reared the tree in God's garden, when God has sent his rain and sun to ripen the clusters, finally the man who tends the tree drops his spade and seizes a club, and shouts to the hungry children about him, "Stand off. Let no one touch these clusters of purple and gold! They are too precious to be eaten. I planted this tree of property! I ripened this fruit and food! What is mine is mine."

Meanwhile children weep and the clusters rot! Strange this perversion. Passing strange this turning of the husbandman against himself. The eye was made for light, but he who misuses the eye until the optic nerve is inflamed finds the light become a torture. Conversation is pleasant to the ears, for the ear was made for hearing; but he who misuses his nerve force can reach a point where every sound is torture to the outraged nerves. God made property to ripen fruit—not for the next generation, but for the people of to-day. Strange that men can be so perverted, so misuse themselves, that they lose all the power to pluck the clusters for feeding the poor and weak. Such a man was Dives. God gave him rich harvests because there were orphans and poor people. The children's arms and laps were spread to receive the corn, but Dives turned his back on the little children and built huge barns instead of harvesting this treasure into the children's hearts. And then he said, "Soul, thou hast much treasure laid up for many years." But what word is this: "Soul, thou hast corn!"? Can a soul eat corn? Can the intellect and the memory consume wheat? Can the taste and the imagination drink oil and wine? Corn was made for the body. If Dives' body had enough corn, plainly the surplus was for the poor and the weak who had no bread. The children pleaded and the poor sobbed, and the beggar died in his rags and poverty. Meanwhile heaven was silent. But all the time approaching from heaven might have been seen a figure—the angel of Justice. Suddenly the sword, red with insufferable wrath against selfishness, leaps from its scabbard.

The Day of Visitation

Dives is dead. On earth they carry him to his tomb under velvet plumes. But Dives' soul stands at the gate of the city of God. And lo, the angel with the flaming sword stands in the way, forbidding his passage. Dives' soul had no place in heaven. Retribution had come. The separation is here. There is a chasm digged between selfishness and love, between iniquity and integrity. There is a great gulf and abyss that stands between Dives' barns and God's palace of amethyst and silver, into which He has swept the orphans that Dives despised. Oh that this generation had eyes to see and ears to hear! Look at the half-billion fortune, while the hundred thousand families that piled it up live in hovels, while the modern Dives has done no stroke of work for twenty years. Meanwhile, the children sob, and heaven is silent. But be not deceived. Heaven is not mocked. Silence does not mean forgetfulness. There is a God in the sky. Human judgments will be reversed. What if the last poor workman in yonder rude hut, who has toiled on faithfully without bitterness or hate or weapon, shall be first before God, while Dives falls a thousand leagues, and becomes last? Until it is Dives that takes up Jesus' words and sobs, "If I had but known! Oh, if I had but known the day of God's visitation!"

Divine visitations come also to the type of man who represents lawless ambition. Let us take as the representative of this type, Saul, the most gifted and best-equipped man of his day. In his youth his father's wealth gave him leisure to study in the school of Gamaliel and to travel in foreign lands. Ambitious, he set his heart on promotion, and determined to get on. The pathway to glory was through the Sanhedrin. That group of men included in themselves control of the lands, the offices, the gold, and the power of the country. Unfortunately for young Saul, no man could belong to the Sanhedrin who was not old and mature. That law was inflexible and never varied. Desperate, young Saul determined to break in. Fortunately for his lawless ambition, the Sanhedrin fronted a crisis. This new faith of Christ was spreading among the people. An old member of the Sanhedrin, Gamaliel, stood up and argued, "If it be of God we cannot fight it, and if it be not of God, it will come to naught. Let us do nothing." Other members had the spirit of Torquemada and the Inquisition. But because they were old they were timid, and dared not fling themselves against the new faith. Their inquisition needed youth, dash, and lawless ambition, so they made overtures to young Saul. A shrewd man, Saul planned the persecution, but himself stood in the background. Just as to-day the men who have organized combinations to destroy the poor and prepared cunning schemes to evade the laws, have themselves stood in the background and put bookkeepers, clerks and puppets forward upon whom the State will now execute its judicial penalties; so then Saul stood afar off and kept the garments of his puppets who stoned Stephen to death.

And now that Saul has won the approval of tl leaders of the Sanhedrin, and the prize is withi his reach, he looks for more cities to conquer an more disciples to persecute, and starts toward Da mascus. It was a long journey, and the way wa solitary. But solitude is terrible for a sinne Nothing can be more awful than for a man who i planning a crime to be off on a journey alone a night, while God's stars blaze at him, and kee blazing. Oh, those stars that would not let Sau sleep! The whole sky at night becomes a divin forehead, out of which blaze these two stars always two and two! And there was a God o justice behind the stars. This sun, too, at high noon, with light insufferable, scorched his soul Conscience became unendurable. Saul saw tha light, saw Stephen's face shining as he lay dying and the splendor of heaven dazzled his own eyes In an agony of remorse he cried aloud. By th way of sin he had gone toward the throne of jus tice, only to find it was a throne of mercy. The divine visitation had come. Reason that had whis pered warnings began to thunder. The praise of men in the Sanhedrin seemed as nothing in the face of the condemnation of God. In an agony of remorse he cried out unto God, and fled into the sands of Arabia, where he remained for three years. He put distance between that Sanhedrin, with its temptations to lawless ambition, and himself. He pursued his vision. He obeyed the divine visitation. He followed the warnings from the battlements of heaven. What changed Saul the Inquisitor to Paul the hero and the martyr? Why, that visitation of God that came to a youth of unbridled ambition, melting him into obedience, self-surrender and loyalty to God. If Saul had not known the day of God's visitation, then the disaster would have been one of the greatest moral disasters in the annals of time.

The Divine Overture

To all men come these overtures divine. Wonderful these moments when truth glows in the soul like coal in the flame. In hours when the reason is struck through and through with light, men are not far from the kingdom of God. These luminous hours are the hours of destiny. They are sometimes as brief as the strategic moment that comes to the astronomer watching an eclipse. For a mo ment the shadow comes and goes, so the scientist must be ready for the moment, and if all things are ready, he carries away the record of the movement of sun and planet, and life and civilization are enriched by the new knowledge. But if the astronomer is careless and sleeps during that precious moment, then the great opportunity is lost, and once lost is lost forever. For when these moods come the one duty is instant action, immediate decision, and irrevocable pledges. The old man, grown callous and hard, may be tempted to reject these moods, counting them mere sentimentalism, and despising them as emotional. A dead soul is like yonder dead moon. What if you could sit down and talk with the spirit of that dead world as you talk with a familiar friend? Suppose the moon would say, "Once I believed in the procession of the seasons. Once I waited for the blowing of the south wind, the arbutus blossom, the tender grass and the flaming orchards. Once I spread my boughs for the birds and sheltered the beasts against the storm. But that is all gone. Now I am practical. I have gotten down to hard pan. I believe in solid rock. No more perfumed sentiments for me. No more ideals and aspirations." And alas for the dead soul that has lost its ideals, given up its dreams and reveries, its secret prayers and hidden hopes! But the wise man will cherish these noble moods. He will nurture these intimations of immortality. The children of time need to be wise toward years that are eternal. Transmuting impulse into action, feeling into thought and habit and conduct, turn in this hour to the friend that is nearest to you, and under the impulse of an overture from God give pledges to yourself and to society. For now is the accepted time, and he who turns his face toward right, duty and God shall hear the sweetest words that ever fell over heaven's battlements, as a divine voice whispers, "Him who cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out."

TO A MOTHER

ERE came one day to join the angel throng
. woman, bowed through serving oft in pain;
as she meekly stood, her form grew strong,
d long-lost youthful beauty dawned again.
more was given; for all, with wonder fraught,
nt low before the sweetness of her face,
ng: "What marvel hath this woman wrought, he thus clothed by such sweet, mighty grace?"
one of seraph tongue made answer low:
ne talent only hers—a faithful heart,
she abroad but little could bestow;
much was needed for her mother's heart;
this with love she always made so fair she became an angel unaware!"

Inspiration—What Is It?

N THE diary of the late Count Tolstoy, which his son has just published in Paris, is a remarkable passage that shows the great ssian in a new light. It was written 1895. Referring to his literary rk he wrote:

have had moments when I felt myself to be medium for the expression of the Divine . I have sometimes been so impure and so ject to personal passions that the light of truth has been obscured by my own obity; but, despite all, I have served at times the intermediary for this truth and those e been the happiest moments of my life. God will that, passing through me, these hs have not been sullied, and may mankind in them its pasture. It is only in that that writings have importance.

nspiration has many degrees. In highest sense, it is the operation of Divine Spirit upon the minds of n, who have been chosen as chanls for the interpretation of truth to man minds. It is inspiration, in rying degrees of enthusiasm and tensity, which gives the preacher his ssage, the prophet his vision. The spiration of the "holy men of old," o were chosen instruments through om God's message to man was realed in the Scriptures, is the fullest ample of this great principle. They oke and wrote as they were commisned; they were filled with the spirit wisdom, and the Christian world hesitatingly accepts their work as divine origin—the result of inspiran. Tolstoy was both philosopher d visionary. There were times when seemed to reach ideal heights, to vel in the pure atmosphere of truth, stice, humanity and brotherly love. such moments he was free from all osser limitations; but they were ansitory—like shafts of sunshine ercing through shifting clouds. Still, his own admission, he valued these tervals of spiritual illumination ore than all of his brilliant stories, s emotional work and his philosophic says. As he neared the end of life saw that the only imperishable ing is divine truth, and prayed that nly those passages in his writings hich contained that truth should be membered by the world. All the rest e reckoned as worthless. Such a conssion is the finest of all testimonies Tolstoy's greatness.

THE VOLK PORTRAIT OF LINCOLN

(See first cover of this issue)

BY ARTHUR H. HOWLAND

WHEN the body of Abraham Lincoln lay in state at Chicago, on its journey from Washington to Springfield, among the thousands who thronged to the courthouse to peer mournfully into the sad, still face was a little boy nine years old. He had been in the street nearly all day, standing in line with a regiment of school children waiting to take their places in the funeral procession, and he remembers still the furious headache that kept him company during the long hours. At length, however, the children swung into the line of march; the courthouse was reached, and the boy stood looking down into the dead President's face.

It was not the first time he had seen Lincoln. Indeed, when he was four years old the big man had taken him on his lap, asked his name, and smiled upon him with his grave, tender eyes. But between that first look and the last, much had happened to Lincoln—and to America. He had been nominated for the Presidency of the United States, elected and inaugurated; he had suffered in his great soul the thrust of every bayonet, the shock of every charge, the dull pain of every bullet wound, the agony of every wife and mother's broken heart during the Civil War. He had been re-elected to the Presidency; he had seen the war brought to a righteous and glorious end; he had seen the Union saved and known in the depths of his soul that he had been God Almighty's instrument in saving it; he had freed three million slaves; he had been misunderstood and trusted, criticized and praised, condemned and honored, hailed as hero, savior, emancipator—and slain.

INTO the face of the man who in five short years had gone through this eternity of travail, the nine-year-old boy looked down on that April day nearly fifty years ago. The little boy is a great artist now, and if you will turn back to the first page of this number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, you will there see the portrait his hand has made of our first martyred President. The Douglas Volk portrait of Lincoln is one of the best, if not the best, ever made. It may seem strange that so great and perfect a portrait could be made years after the death of the subject and by a man who had not seen his model since boyhood. But there is more than has yet been told in the story of how Douglas Volk came to paint this portrait of Abraham Lincoln.

The question of heredity and parental influence are impossible of full solution, but the real painting of the great portrait began when Douglas Volk's father, the sculptor, Leonard W. Volk, formed the desire to make a portrait bust of the Illinois lawyer who received in 1860 the nomination for the Presidency. When Lincoln took little Douglas Volk upon his knee, he had just come from the elder Volk's studio (where he had given the sculptor a sitting for the bust) to the sculptor's apartment in the same building. During the time spent in making this bust Mr. Volk made also a life mask of Lincoln, and it was he who later made the famous casts of Lincoln's hands. The very name "Douglas" is reminiscent. The boy was so named by Stephen A. Douglas, who was a cousin of his mother, and it was while Lincoln was a Presidential candidate against Douglas that the bust was finished. It was, indeed, the fact that Mr. Volk had made a bust of Mr. Douglas, and was a connection of his, that got him his introduction to Mr. Lincoln. This is one of the delightfully nice balances of history, is it not?—that two men, one related by blood and the other by marriage to Lincoln's great opponent, should be the men who produced for the world what are perhaps the most affectionately appreciative and trustworthy reminders of his grave face and his mighty hands.

THE portrait was made at Mr. Volk's home at Central Lowell, Me. In his winter studio in New York, I sat for an hour and talked with him about his own and his father's work. It was inevitable that he should long to do on canvas what his father had done in clay. At last he was ready to undertake the task. "I made three portraits and destroyed them," he told me, "before I felt I had anything approaching my ideal. I had a very vivid and definite standard to which to work, established by my very early environment, by Lincoln's history, name and memory, and my father's description of him on the many occasions of their meeting. It was really a severe mental strain, my desire was so intense to reproduce that face. I became almost obsessed with the craving to see the man."

At last the artist triumphed. The real Lincoln looked forth from the canvas upon which he toiled. He laid the portrait aside for a year, took it up with fresh eyes and a rested brain, made a few last touches with his skilful hands—and the world now has this true, sad vision of the soul of Lincoln as it was revealed in that face of his, which careless people have called unlovely, but which these two great artists agree was most truly beautiful.

Side by side with this portrait of Lincoln, made by one who understood his sorrow and had looked upon his face in death, should stand this word-picture from the pen of Newell Dwight Hillis. His words interpret the portrait as the portrait illuminates his words:

"Seeking a deliverer and a savior, the great God, in his own purpose, passed by the palace with its silken delights. He took a little babe in his arms, and called to his side his favorite angel, the angel of Sorrow. Stooping, he whispered, 'O Sorrow, thou well-beloved teacher, take thou this little child of mine and make him great. Take him to yonder cabin in the wilderness; make his home a poor man's house; plant his narrow path thick with thorns; cut his little feet with sharp and cruel rocks as he climbs the hills of difficulty; make each footprint red with his own life-blood; load his little back with burdens; give to him days of toil and nights of study and sleeplessness; wrest from his arms whatever he loves; make his heart, through sorrow, as sensitive to the sigh of a slave as a thread of silk in a window is sensitive to the lightest wind that blows; and when you have digged lines of pain in his cheeks, and made his face more marred than the face of any man of his time, bring him back to me, and with him I will free three million slaves.' That is how God made Abraham Lincoln great."

REWARD

A CHARGE I have to show the way, to lift
From Fate's dark thrall,
And lead unto the Light—God's sacred gift.
Have I done all
That He who gives the strength of will and heart
Would have me do,
And make for better lives and deeds their part,
Though there be few?
Patience and Love will work, we surely know.
A world of good;
This gift of sacred seed, ah, do I sow
Just as I should?
I pray for light to see the urgent need,
And do my part
To stimulate the lagging thought and feed
The hungry heart.
Have I instilled into the dreaming brain
Some thought of cheer?
Have I entuned a hymn or glad refrain
To drive out fear?
Have I shown up the folly or the sin
That they should shun
Or given praise to Christ, weak souls to win
By deeds well done?
If these I have not done to light the gloom
For our dear Lord,
Let "failure" chiseled deep upon my tomb
Be my reward.

A Generous Gift

MONEY invested in the Lord's work is never idle, and multiplies itself in blessing. An illustration of this fact is found in the experience of many of our readers who have made it a rule to systematically devote a certain part of their incomes to the Lord's work at home or abroad. There are many members of our Family Circle who find a joy and satisfaction in this sort of investment which can be realized in no other way. Some support missionaries and are in constant touch with the work of the Gospel army at the front in heathen lands; others are training children at missionary schools, that they may become teachers and preachers in turn; still others are doing the Lord's work at home, in helping rescue missions, unendowed schools, Gospel settlements and enterprises of various kinds—all properly coming within the category of Christian work.

One of our readers who has already experienced the "joy of service," and whose large-hearted donations have a godsend to many, on January 11, 1913, sent us from Pine Grove, Pa., his check for $400 with the instructions that it be used in Gospel charities. NEW YORK'S WAITER STRIKE

A LONG threatened strike of the waiters of the New York hotels and big restaurants marked the closing days of last month. There was much excitement during the period, and in the beginning it looked as if serious consequences were about to ensue from the attitude of the strikers. Almost ten thousand waiters, cooks, bus-boys and kitchen help threw up their jobs and walked out, leaving their employers in a state of panic, practically helpless to carry on their business and serve their patrons. The large hotels suffered most. Several of these employ three hundred waiters each, and when the strike was declared it was feared that some of them would have to close their doors for the time being, which would have meant the loss of many thousands of dollars. All kinds of help were pressed into service to take the places of those who had stepped out. Chambermaids, telephone girls, bell-boys, hall-boys, porters, and others of a nondescript class were summoned to the kitchens and the tables, and as most of these were inexperienced in the work, many ridiculous blunders and exciting incidents took place. In fact, the whole hotel district of the city was turned topsy-turvy and confusion prevailed almost everywhere throughout the crowded section. Supper parties had to be abandoned, wedding feasts and public dinners postponed, and late evening crowds, for the first time in many years, were compelled to go home hungry.

In the meantime wild scenes were being enacted on the streets and in public halls by the disgruntled strikers. They held many indignation meetings here and there throughout the city, rousing speeches of encouragement were made by the leaders, and the men were strongly exhorted to keep up the fight until the inn-keepers and restaurateurs would acquiesce and comply with their demands. When they turned out of the halls after listening to those addresses, they paraded the streets in large bodies and some very disgraceful scenes marked their march, which soon turned into a demonstration of hostility against the hotels. Jeers, hoots, yells, party cries and expressions of defiance were followed by open attacks on some of the leading hotels, and at times so violent did the mob become that the police were totally inadequate to cope with them. Stones, brickbats, and other missiles hurtled through the air, and the glass was shivered in scores of windows, besides which many chairs and tables were broken and doors and casements wrecked. At the Waldorf-Astoria the crowd engaged in a furious battle with policemen until dispersed by a reinforcement of the mounted squad. At the Astor, McAlpin, St. Regis and Plaza, special detachments of the police were required to maintain order, but even the large forces of uniformed men at these places were at times unable to keep the excited strikers within bounds. The hooting and howling in almost a dozen of languages created a very Babel of a din, and the quiet citizens were glad to get away from the streets to escape the ear-splitting, nerve-jangling racket. At some places the police had to draw their revolvers to keep the infuriated men at bay. The famous Delmonico restaurant at Fifth Avenue and Forty-fourth Street was the scene of much of the excitement.

A View of the Mass Meeting of Striking Waiters in Union Square, New York

A large plate glass window on the Avenue side the place was smashed and a flying brick bare missed the heads of two ladies dining in the roo There was no need to make a demonstration Sherry's equally famous restaurant on the opposi corner, as that establishment was in complete dar ness, there being no waiters to serve patrons customers, consequently the management had close for the time being. At the McAlpin in He ald Square, the latest addition the hostelries of New York and or of the largest purely commercial h tels on this continent, there wer fifteen hundred persons at dinne when the strike was called. Thre hundred waiters immediately qui work, but it may be said that the did so unwillingly, for this is one o the great hotels who treat the me well. However, orders from th union had to be obeyed, so the man agement was left to take care of th guests as best it could. Strike breakers could not be obtained t take the places vacated, because th strikers had adopted a new move that of picketing the employment agencies and persuading or frightening away non-union men who were desirous of getting employment.

Union Square was the scene of one of the largest meetings of the strikers. Thousands gathered in this place to hear addresses from their leaders, among the latter being a young Irish-American Joan of Arc, Miss Elizabeth Gurley Flynn, who is known throughout the country as a labor leader and Socialist propagandist. The speech-making over, the crowds turned into Broadway and Fifth Avenue, parading these thoroughfares for many hours.

After keeping up a hostile attitude for a few days, causing much confusion and crippling the hotels, the strikers came to the conclusion that their struggle was hopeless, inasmuch as the proprietors and managers remained adamantine to all demands. Moreover, they became convinced that the hotels somehow could get along without them, and resolved to reseek their old positions. As the management of many of the hotels felt bitterly toward the strikers for their course, numbers of them were turned away, but the great majority were allowed to take up their duties again, perhaps sadder, but at the same time wiser for their experiences.

THE AIM OF THE EQUAL SUFFRAGISTS

BY CANDUS MACE MARTZOLFF

IN THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for November 13 appeared an article entitled "The Rule of American Women," by Evelyn Baker Dodd. I should like to discuss that article briefly.

Mrs. Dodd starts out by saying: "History teaches us that when this country was first settled, and for generations following, the women were in the background. We have little mention of them. They kept silent in the churches and out of public life, remaining strictly in their own homes, where they undoubtedly wielded a powerful and lasting influence." The history which I have been fortunate enough to read contains much mention of women in pioneer days. They not only did the usual woman's work, but most of them worked shoulder to shoulder with the men, assisting even in the clearing of the land and tilling of the soil afterward. And women helping to gather the harvest was a common sight. The homes they built were little governments in themselves. They were sufficient unto themselves. Nearly every article of food, drink and clothing was produced at home by the labor of the family, much of it by the women of the family. The pioneer home was little affected by outside law. The people of seventy-five or a hundred years ago scarcely realized the existence of a government if they were law-abiding. On the Fourth of July, when they heard the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States read, at tax-paying time, on election day, and when "court sat," they were reminded of the "powers that be."

To-day all that is changed. Growth of population and advance in civilization have, in a sense, made community living a necessity. The old home was a law unto itself. The modern home is a creature of the law, and upon the wisdom of the law the happiness of the inmates depends. The women of former times did the work of the home, in the home. Because of inventions and a desire to make money by manufacturing, the work formerly done in the home has been removed to factories. The women of to-day, several millions of them, have followed their work into the factories and are working there under exactly the same conditions as men, except that they have no voice in determining the sanitary conditions under which they shall labor, the number of hours that shall constitute a legal day's work for them, the wages they shall be paid, nor any rules or regulations in regard to inspection, protection from fire and the like. It is conceded by the anti-suffragists that the ballot is a good thing for the laboring man; then why not for the laboring woman? History very clearly shows that a disfranchised class is always at a disadvantage.

The early home very largely made its own environment. The environment of the modern home is made by law, which is made by the voter. That that environment can, in most cases, be improved, no one will question. And if woman's influence is such a blessed and uplifting thing when exerted indirectly, it surely should lose none of its purity and potency when exercised directly. The woman in the old home never had put up to her questions of taxation—unless she were a spinster, as no married woman could own property—water rates, gas rates, street car fares, meat, milk, and other food inspection, medical inspection of school children, street railway and other franchises, issuing of bonds for any purpose, the saloon problem, the gambling evil, the white slave traffic, child labor and scores of other matters that pertain just as much to women and children as to men, or even more. If Mrs. Dodd will turn back the wheels of time seventy-five years and put all the industries back into the home and do away with all the perplexing problems developed by civilization, I make little doubt the women would follow their work, which is what they have always done. And as it is a most obvious law of nature that all things change, and develop and grow by change in this universe, why should woman alone be supposed to stand still? Isn't it strange that while half of the world has progressed the other half has retrograded? Does any thinking person believe the women of to-day are inferior to their great-grandmothers, class for class? The woman of to-day is the superior of her great-grandmother, and she ought to be. The great-grandmother filled her niche admirably, and we should imitate her in that we should fill our niche as effectively, always remembering it is an entirely different niche.

As to the "women keeping silent in the churches and staying strictly in their own homes"—one wonders? If our women kept silent in our churches to-day, where would the churches be? Even the churches that give them no voice in their administration suffer them to teach and explain their doctrines outside the pulpit, and the women are always permitted to do the "general drudgery" pertaining to the upkeep of the church. The great body of missionary work, Sunday school work, and most of the charitable and benevolent work of the churches is done by women, to say nothing of the financial support they give the church and all its activities. Can any one estimate the loss to the world had such women as Frances E. Willard and Dr. Anna Shaw "kept silence in the churches"?

The churches that stand to-day for the highest moral and spiritual ideals are the churches that have gone farthest in emancipating women from the silly conventions and foolish prejudices of a by-gone time.

Mrs. Dodd gives as one reason for denying the ballot to women that "they lack strong mental fiber and full muscular development." Speaking of the last first, does Mrs. Dodd mean to put John L. Sullivan and Jack Johnson above William J. Bryan and Booker T. Washington? Comparisons are odious but are sometimes necessary. Mrs. Dodd has neglected to give her definition of "mental fiber," so all we can do is to point to the "fiber" that enters into

Seminole Visitors to the Mission

THE CROSS IN THE EVERGLADES

TO PLANT the Cross in the Florida Everglades has been a unique missionary work, in some respects more like carrying the Gospel to the heart of Africa than merely to a swampy and unpopulous region in one of the oldest and most richly favored Southern States in our Union. When the Bishop of Southern Florida goes to visit the Seminole Indians of his diocese, he reaches, at Fort Myers, the terminal point of a long and fatiguing railroad trip, and from there must proceed fully seventy miles through somber cypress swamps and those strange tropical prairies known to the earlier geographers as savannas. Let it be dry weather, his beasts of burden must plow through heavy sands, following often but a dim and wavering trail. If the rainy season is on, the vague trail is frequently lost in miles of water, averaging from six inches to three feet in depth. Night falls, and the prelate and driver alike roll themselves in blankets and go to sleep by a campfire, sometimes having first to pile up palm fronds to get out of reach of water.

Bishop Gray, upon whom this duty devolves, is now a man of venerable age, yet he continues with absolute regularity his visits to the two remote stations which, after years of struggle and self-sacrifice, he has succeeded in establishing for the long-neglected people of the Glades.

At Glade Cross, as the second mission has now come to be generally known, they built a small lodge for use as a missionary residence and as a hospital if need should be.

At an early stage Bishop Gray and his coadjutor realized that, owing to certain serious obstacles, as for instance, the nomadic tribal habit and the utter distrust in which the Seminole, by reason of past disaster, holds the white man, they must find and use some power of attraction and means of winning confidence more direct and telling than any up to this time in force. No school could be established, no ordinary missionary work done, until Indian and missionary could get closer, in every sense. From zealous and protracted study of the situation, the bishop and the pastor at Glade Cross, Rev. Mr. Gibbs, arrived at the conviction that the best magnet for their immediate use was medicine, and they set themselves to carry a new purpose into fulfilment.

Because of the lack of resources, however, it was some time before any real hospital work could be inaugurated in that remote and inaccessible place. But they achieved it at last. In the year 1906 Dr. W. J. Godden, an Englishman by birth but Floridian by several years' adoption, was installed at Glade Cross as medical missionary. Before the doctor had been here many months, he had his endurance and zeal in the cause put to severe test. An epidemic of measles with attendant pneumonia sent a great number of the Indians to the mission at one time, a number far in excess of hospital capacity, equipment or service. The Rev. Mr. Gibbs and wife, who had devoted years to the self-sacrificing work, had gone to another field. Dr. Godden stood alone except for one white lad and whatever Indian helper he might be able to draw to him.

In this epidemic the doctor treated twenty-seven of the pneumonia cases, and out of all there were but two deaths, both directly attributable to the carelessness of the patients themselves. Through the long and severe ordeal the doctor was cook, nurse and chambermaid, sometimes also washerwoman and seamstress, as well as attentive physician and devout missionary. But it marked a crisis, even an epoch, this little period of peculiar developments. One pair of stout hands, one alert, intelligent and trained mind, and backing all one heroic soul, saved the day, and the issue may yet prove that they saved an historic racial remnant from impending extinction.

Since that time of peril, sickness and death and unremitting devotion, the Seminoles have given their absolute confidence to this medical missionary. In witness of the great moral conquest, note this peculiar tribal enactment of June, 1908. At that time, the Seminole Shot-ca-taw, or Green Corn Dance, was held the most important of their yearly festivals, marked also by the annual council of the tribe. Here the chiefs, assembled around the council-fire in solemn conclave, passed a remarkable decree, lifting the immemorial inhibition which forbade their people to receive instruction in the white man's way or religion. One of the leading braves was ordered to proceed as a messenger of state to Glade Cross, conveying the tidings that this ban was formally removed, and the Seminoles might henceforth hear the Gospel and receive baptism if they so desired.

Since that time a few converts have been baptized, notable men of the tribe in each case, and numbers have come in from the Glade coverts to gather about the Wilderness Cross and listen with earnest attention to the psalm, prayer, litany and sermon. They are singularly devoted to music and have learned to join in many of the hymns, which Dr. Godden accompanies on the little melodeon.

Four years ago, the bishop and his missionaries secured sufficient funds to enable them to purchase "Bill Brown's Store," three miles beyond the original site of Glade Cross, and they removed the mission and hospital to this more favorable location. Bill Brown had long held local renown as a trader with the Indians, having occupied, for more than a quarter of a century, a strategic position at what is known as "The Landing," a well elevated knoll or "island" at the head of canoe navigation in the Glades. He had also established and kept an enviable reputation for square dealing with his red customers. He was now ready to retire from the business, his good wife urging that they should take their sturdy band of wilderness-bred boys and girls to Immokalee, the first mission station established, or some other "town," to be educated.

To own this commissary and landing, a long-accepted resting-place for the Indians when out on the big hunt, the undisputed base of supplies where they come to sell their hides, furs, plumes, and coontie, buying in exchange guns, ammunition, provisions and calico, to add the inheritance of Bill Brown's repute for squareness to the confidence already won by the mission workers, was a practical move of considerable import. Now, in very truth, the Seminole and the missionary were brought close enough to establish an adequate working basis.

In July, 1909, a new building was erected as a store-room and dwelling, and the old store was fitted up as chapel and rest-rooms, the chancel, altar, and organ at one end being veiled when not in use by a heavy duck curtain, which also serves as a screen for stereopticon pictures in connection with lectures and talks to the Indians. The carpenter work and painting of the chapel were done entirely by Dr. Godden, with the occasional assistance of an Indian and Rev. Mr. Trout, who comes at intervals from Fort Myers to hold services at the remote station.

We can no longer follow the undertaking in detail, deeply significant though the details undoubtedly are. Here at Glade Cross is the center, the very heart of any relief work, actual or at present possible, for the wronged race, of whom the noble Bishop Whipple said: "The Seminoles have been treated worse, more unjustly, than any other tribe in the whole United States."

It is difficult to realize that this homeless fragment of a people still retain, after nearly two centuries of disaster, the traditional pride which distinguished the caciques of the early Floridas. They ask nothing from the United States Government, would accept nothing, indeed, unless tactfully offered as their righteous due, and through the men who have won their confidence, or through others aligning with these. The gauntest straggler who drops in at the mission store in times of bad hunting and deluged crops will hardly admit that the Indians are needy. "Injun no hungry now," he will answer to your hospitable question, throwing back his proud, melancholy head as if gazing into that remote past with which—who knows?—he may be mentally contrasting the present moment.

They ask for nothing except by way of purchase, and it would be unprecedented for a Seminole to "jump his account." It is not difficult to see why the mission needed the store. Besides the advantage of location and the closer contact with the Indians in general, the mission can also, through this agency, help the Indians in general, without seeming to dispense charity. Dr. Godden has steadily kept the prices of skins and furs up and of provisions down. The store is thus run at some loss in dollars and cents, but of great gain in the efficiency and scope of the mission's relief work.

The doctor and his assistants at the Landing, moreover, kept open house for the Seminoles at all times, dispensing a simple, cordial hospitality frankly accepted by the Glade people, whose appreciation, as well as sense of reciprocity, is shown by their custom of bringing "gift offerings" of their best to these good neighbors who, with kindness and truth, are gradually wiping the stains from the white man's name.

The Bureau of Social Hygiene

A STRONG effort is to be made to grapple with the social evil in New York City, not, however, by means of reform boards or aldermanic investigations, but by a body of earnest men and women who have instituted a permanent organization to wage warfare against the forces of evil. This new departure in behalf of the city's purity and for the moral uplift of the underworld has been termed the Bureau of Social Hygiene. Although the scope and object of this bureau and how it intends to deal with the problem of New York City has been announced but a few days, it may be said to have had its inception a couple of years ago when the then grand jury, of which a leading young millionaire was foreman, began to investigate the cancerous growth which threatened the vitality of the city. To make a real and lasting improvement in conditions a permanent organization was created, the continuation of which is not dependent on any temporary reform wave or outburst of popular indignation. The bureau has already established a laboratory of social hygiene at Bedford Hills, where it is proposed to study from the physical, mental, social and moral side each person committed to the reformatory. It is expected that much will be accomplished by this novel method.

Lincoln and Livingstone

NOT many great names of history belong so well together as the names of Abraham Lincoln and David Livingstone. Lincoln ended American slavery. Livingstone, by his observations, his disclosures and his denunciations, was the most potent factor in bringing to an utter end the slave trade in Africa. He finished his great book about the slave trade on the day Lincoln was assassinated; his son Robert fought in the Federal ranks during the American Civil War and was killed at Gettysburg; one of the lakes he discovered in Africa he named after Lincoln. Lincoln said of the curse of slavery: "If I ever get a chance to hit this thing I will hit it hard." Livingstone said: "All I can add in my loneliness is, may heaven's rich blessing come down on every one —American, English, or Turk—who will help to heal the open sore of the world," and "Oh! when shall the time come in which every man that feels the heat of the sun shall be freed from all other fetters but bonds of love to our Saviour!"

It is a happy coincidence that while the churches are laying careful plans to celebrate the hundredth anniversary of Livingstone's birth, both houses of the United States Congress have agreed upon erecting a two-million-dollar memorial at the nation's capital to the memory of Abraham Lincoln. Proof of how well the old enmities between the North and South have healed is seen in the fact that the House vote for the memorial was practically unanimous, representatives from both sections vying with one another in eulogizing the first martyred President.

But all the enthusiasm over these fair heroes will come to naught unless it is turned into earnest action. Richard Watson Gilder in his fine sonnet, "At Luther's Grave," makes the great reformer cry:

> Onward lies truth! My work were never done
> If souls by me awakened climbed not higher.

The soul of Lincoln sends its challenge to the men and women of America to-day to right the wrong remaining, to strike off the shackles that still oppress. The soul of Livingstone still cries: "Anywhere, provided it be forward!" and calls to the church to finish speedily the task he made possible, the task of flooding the Dark Continent with the light that streams from the heart of the radiant Christ whom he loved and trusted, served and followed even unto death.

A Campaign for Morality

AFTER a two years' investigation of the causes, operation and possibilities of the suppression of the "white slave" traffic, a representative committee of New York citizens has at last made its report. This is the organization of which John D. Rockefeller, Jr., is chairman. It has examined or conferred with more than one hundred witnesses, including lawyers, physicians, business men, bank presidents, clergymen, settlement workers, labor leaders and reformers, and has investigated the "forces of evil" from every practical viewpoint and made a comprehensive survey of the conditions of vice in New York City. As the work proceeded, the conviction grew that a permanent private organization, free from political control, was desirable, and the outcome was the establishment of a Bureau of Social Hygiene, which has now been at work for some time. The sphere of investigation will be extended to other American cities, and it is hoped that out of all this labor some practical plan may be devised for dealing with the social evil in our American cities. The investigators in their report add that the work is not undertaken in any spirit of criticism of public officials. In view of the recent police disclosures in New York, which showed the existence of a league with the lowest class of criminals, and that the white slave traffic flourished under the fostering wing of the "system," it is difficult to understand how such an investigation could now be conducted without involving those public officers who are in a large degree responsible for aggravated criminal conditions. Samuel H. London, an expert connected with the Department of Justice at Washington, on January 30 testified before an aldermanic committee in New York that $57,000,000 annually is spent on vice in that city in connection with the "white slave" system alone. Let us hope that substantial good may result from these investigations and that they may become a means of improving the moral atmosphere, not only of the metropolis, but of other cities that suffer from similar conditions.

The Little Old Lady

SHE was a quiet-looking, middle-aged lady, with every evidence of refinement. One day last week she stepped into the counting-room of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and in a low voice spoke to one of the clerks, telling her she wished to make a contribution to the Bread-Line. Opening her handbag she took from it two bills, and folding and handing them over, said: "Here is something that will help, I hope." She would give no name, explaining with a smile that she did not wish publicity, and the initials "C. S." would suffice. Then she nodded, and withdrew as quietly as she came. It was not an unusual occurrence. There are many dear souls who, in pure goodness of heart, love to do kind things secretly and not to give alms before men for vainglory and notoriety. When the clerk unfolded the gift, she found two $50 bills. These have been put to use in feeding the Bread Line unfortunates on these cold winter mornings at their one o'clock meal. Our little elderly lady builded better than she knew. Her gift provided for 4,000 poor, homeless, unemployed men and lads, giving each a substantial meal of roll sandwiches and coffee. Just think of it—4,000 fed by one good-hearted woman, whose generous soul shrank from even giving her name. The Master fed 5,000 once by a miracle. This humble follower simply devoted a part of her own means to the work, which was multiplied beyond all expectation. The sympathetic and gentle little woman, who would probably have regarded a crowd with horror, thus for several nights gave a bigger dinner-party than any other host in America, although she could hardly have dreamed of such a thing.

This is the season of dinners and banquets. When you, dear reader, next open your well-filled pocketbook and take out a ten-dollar bill, just remember that that sum, small as it may seem to you, would suffice to feed four hundred hungry men in the Bread Line. Remember, too, that for $25 you could have a thousand famished men as your own exclusive guests for one night. It's worth thinking about, and puts a new value on money, which some scatter so lightly. Our little old lady probably never saw the Bread Line nor marked the pinched faces or the poor, pitiful garments of the unfortunates. But you may assuredly depend upon that men who gather at midnight for a meal are not likely to forget, in their thoughts or their prayers, those who remember the poor fellows of the Bread Line.

Startling Divorce Statistics

NO MORE convincing argument has ever been presented in favor of a uniform divorce law than that found in the evidence laid before the New York State Marriage and Divorce Commission at a recent meeting held in that city. Divorce statistics of the year just closed showed that throughout the whole country 100,000 decrees had been issued and 70,000 children, mostly under ten years of age, have been deprived by law of one or both parents. In the last forty years 1,350,000 divorces had been granted, over 5,000,000 persons, adults and children, being affected by these decrees. One-half of all the divorces occur in the Middle Western States. Illinois shows a record of 120,000, Pennsylvania 55,700, California 50,000, and New York 44,450. Migratory divorces, in which the parties were sent from one State to another, formed a large percentage of the cases originating in the East. From 25 to 50 per cent. of the children in our reform schools are the offspring of divorced parents. Figures such as these knock all the bottom out of fine sentiment and show us to be a divorce-loving nation. It seems to be a hopeless task to expect individual States to reform their divorce laws. It must be done, if at all, through Federal legislation. In Reno, Nev., it was learned that divorces are frequently granted on the unsupported testimony of one party in a suit.

Margaret E. Sangster, Jr.

IN NEXT week's CHRISTIAN HERALD Margaret E. Sangster, Jr., the talented daughter of the son of the late Margaret E. Sangster, whose name was for many years a familiar one to our readers, will take her place on the regular staff of this journal. She will conduct a department especially devoted to the interests of young girls just budding into womanhood. Her articles, which have already appeared in these pages, show that she has inherited much of the talent of her brilliant predecessor, and we bespeak for her work a cordial welcome. The girls of to-day, who are to be the wives and mothers of the future, will be personally interested in the topics which Miss Sangster will discuss and concerning which she will invite a free interchange of ideas from her readers. Her page will be an open forum for the sisters and daughters of the household and for the mothers as well. "In the multitude of councils there is wisdom," says the Good Book, and in her discussion of feminine topics the writer should find encouraging co-operation from those of her own sex in every home in which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is now a weekly visitor.

General Notes

KING ALFONSO of Spain has expressed a desire to visit the United States in the near future. Liberal tendencies are becoming very marked in his administration. Lately he told Professor Azcarté, leader of the Republican-Socialists, that in future crises even Anti-Monarchists would be consulted. He has held out the hope that cabinet posts may yet be given to Republicans and Socialists.

THE BRITISH SUFFRAGETTES, untaught by recent experience, have begun a new militant campaign which, according to a declaration credited to Mrs. Pankhurst, may be expected to do almost everything except jeopardize human life. They have smashed a number of windows in Dublin Castle and Lambeth Palace, set fire to the contents of mail pillar boxes, catapulted shop windows from omnibus tops with leaden pellets marked "Votes for Women," and done various other absurd things for which a number of the more aggressive are now in jail. Now they threaten to transfer their attentions to the British museum and the National Gallery and to "make London unbearable to the average citizen."

—ON JANUARY 30 Charles Nagel, Secretary of Commerce and Labor, definitely denied permission to Cipriano Castro, the former president of Venezuela, to enter the United States even as a visitor. Venezuela's former president positively refused to answer the question whether or not he was a party to the killing of General Paredes. The immigration authorities' report on their examination of Castro stated his refusal to answer the question, and held that this course might in itself constitute an admission of the act. Under the existing laws, this admission bars him. "It is officially charged," said Mr. Nagel in his report, "that Castro, while president of Venezuela and in full possession of the authority of that State, directed the killing of Paredes without trial or hearing of any kind, Paredes at that time having been made a prisoner while engaged in a revolt against Castro." Mr. Nagel further stated that the information upon which this decision is based was specific, and was confirmed by authentic copies of the original telegrams.

Ohio and Mississippi Floods

THE heavy rains that cause the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers to overflow to a greater or less extent every season have occasioned singularly severe floods recently. The valeys of the two rivers looked like lakes; the farms vere submerged, and some of the villages and cities vere put to great inconvenience. The beautiful city f Louisville, Ky., has suffered peculiarly. The water ose twelve feet in one day in that city. Some ouses floated away, others had their roofs barely ut of the water, and groups of houses were nchored to each other. For ten days the police fed he people living in the upper stories of the houses t the foot of Fourth Street, and a boat patrol took are of the lives and property of the unfortunate nes. Bad as has been the loss in farm property, n horses, cattle, hogs, etc., along both rivers, there has fortunately been little, if any, loss of life in the floods, and the gratitude of a nation goes out to a divine Providence who has spared life; and sympathy for those who have lost their homes and fortunes has been felt by the people of the country. Those who build their cities and homes at the base of volcanoes, or in the earthquake zone, or on the low banks of rivers, take a great risk, and calamities often follow. There are compensations in the floods from swollen rivers. A deposit is left that is a fertilizer, and which adds incalculably to the value of farm property in such localities. These floods of the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers have added great money value to the bottom farms, which produce such fabulous crops of corn that one of these regions in Illinois is called "Egypt." This compensation of nature suggests the divine authority over the floods as expressed by the psalmist:

The floods have lifted up, O Lord, the floods have lifted up their voice; the floods lift up their waves. The Lord on high is mightier than the noise of many waters. (Ps. 93: 3, 4)

Discoverers of the Poles

THE discoverer of the North Pole, Rear Admiral Robert E. Peary (retired), Captain Roald Amundsen, who found the South Pole, and Sir Ernest Shackleton, who has been farther south than any one except Amundsen, have been visiting cities of the United States, including New York and Philadelphia, lecturing and enjoying a round of receptions forever to be remembered by those who have had the good fortune to attend them. The descriptions given of the territory traversed, the difficulties overcome, the victories achieved, were listened to with deepest attention and will make one of the most remarkable chapters in the history of geographical discovery on the earth. Through all the ages the explorer has opened the way, and the tribes of men with business and religion have followed in it. Peary set up the Stars and Stripes in occupancy of the North Pole, Amundsen claimed the South Pole in the name of Norway. The followers of the Cross, the missionaries, are claiming the whole earth, its territory and peoples, as the possession of the divine King in answer to the prophecy:

He shall have dominion also from sea to sea, and from the river to the ends of the earth. (Ps. 72: 8.)

Athletic Champion Won Unfairly

THE country was not more thrilled with joy and pride when James Thorpe, the Indian student at the government school at Carlisle, Pa., won the Olympic championship in Sweden last summer than it was shocked and humiliated by the discovery that the championship was secured by unfair means. The contests at Stockholm were limited to amateurs. It has just been proven that Thorpe in 1909 had played baseball for money on a team in the South, and was hence disqualified from entering the contests in Sweden. He never told any of his friends at the college or elsewhere of the fact, but by degrees it leaked out and Thorpe made a confession. He asked the athletic societies and the public not to be too hard in their criticism of him, as he was a crude Indian boy and not accustomed to the standards of the white people, but admitted that he had made a great mistake, for which he was sorry. All his prizes are to be sent back, all his records are to be effaced, and the men next to him in the contests are to take his prizes and fame. This effacement will cause a change in the points won by the various nations as follows: The original point standing in the track and field events, the distinctive Olympic games in Stockholm, was: United States, 85; Finland, 29; Sweden, 27; Great Britain, 15; Canada, 7; South Africa, 5; Germany, 4; France, 4; Greece, 4; Norway, 2; Italy, 1; and Hungary, 1. The corrected standing will be: United States, 80½; Sweden, 30; Finland, 29; Great Britain, 15; Canada, 8½; South Africa, 5; Germany, 4; France, 4; Greece, 4; Norway, 3; Italy, 1; Hungary, 1. The depth of humiliation can be measured from the height of the honors conferred. The king of Sweden in making the awards said to Thorpe: "You, sir, are the most wonderful athlete in the world," and for his victory in the pentathlon presented him with the ruler's own challenge trophy, a handsome bronze of himself, and for his triumph in the decathlon, the costly replica of a Viking ship, which was donated by the Czar of Russia. These two events made him the hero of the Stockholm Olympiad. Explanations, excuses, and apologies have been made all the way from the faculty of the school at Carlisle up through the American Association to the highest athletic authority responsible for the Olympic games in Sweden. How much better to have been the big, strong, intelligent, manly Indian in his ordinary sphere than to have won championships by unfair means! Many white people undertake to secure the prizes of fame and money by unfair means. Some of them are exposed, and others go undiscovered until the final reckoning, when they are reduced to the ranks. However great the genius or success in life's contests, there is failure, and all comes to naught in the eternal adjustment of things, where truth, sincere and unequivocal, is wanting. The prophet thus refers to such:

They will deceive every one his neighbor, and will not speak the truth. (Jer. 9: 5.)

Chased Butterfly a Year

A TELEGRAM from Chicago revealed the interesting story of a 25,000-mile chase for a butterfly, told by Mrs. William Carleton Yange, wife of an English entomologist connected with the French Institute of Entomology, who is on her way to join her husband in New York. Mrs. Yange said her husband had made the journey of 25,000 miles for the sole purpose of catching one butterfly, one insignificant, long, red-spotted bug belonging to the Bombyx family, which is about as numerous as the population of China. Mrs. Yange said: "We have had the most extraordinary good fortune. The actual classification of the butterfly I do not know, but I know he has two spots in each upper wing, which render him exceedingly desirable. Moreover, he is snugly done up in a tin box hermetically sealed and would bring joy to entomologists whose collections lack this particular specimen. We have been butterfly-chasing from Paris to Kioto, and we got our little Bombyx in the garden of a Japanese gentleman's residence at Kioto after pursuing him twelve months." Some of the butterflies of this continent are the blue, sulphur, cabbage, anglewing, painted lady, zebra swallowtail, silverspot, peacock, wood swallowtail, wood nymph, milkweed, tiger swallowtail, mourning cloak, and red-spotted purple. The naturalist could not at first find the bombyx or the kind of a butterfly he sought; but he did not cease his search nor his journey around the world, till he had found his specimen. It is that kind of singleness of purpose that achieves the greatest success in the realm of science, literature and art, in business and religion. This singleness of Christian purpose Paul describes in his own experience:

This one thing I do, forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before, I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus. (Phil. 3: 13, 14.)

Dog's Love for Master

MR. LUCIAN GRAY went aboard a Boston express train at South Norwalk, Conn., a few days ago. Meteor, his full-blooded greyhound, followed him to the station. He was anxious to get on the train, but the brakeman prevented it. The dog ran along the train first on one side and then on the other till he saw through the window the car and seat occupied by his master. When the train started so did Meteor. For a mile the dog kept the speed of the train, running along by the side of the coach containing his master, and as near to his window as possible. Then he dropped behind the train, and when he had run six miles he sank down exhausted and died of the over-exertion. His master got off the train at Stamford, secured an automobile, and went back, and to his great sorrow found his pet Meteor dead. This dog's love for his master, stronger than his life, puts to shame the coldness and inhumanity of many people, and the faint love that we reasoning creatures so often have for our divine Master. It seems to us that the dogs of olden time cannot have been so beautiful and loyal in their affection as in our time, or they would not have been held in such poor esteem, would not have been used as the type of a low or mean person, as expressed in these words:

Beware of dogs, beware of evil workers. (Phil. 3: 2.)

CIVIL STRIFE AND REVOLT IN TURKEY

THE OUTLOOK FOR SETTLED CONDITIONS IN MACEDONIA AND THRACE GROWS LESS HOPEFUL

THE long interrupted peace negotiations between the representatives of the Balkan League and of the Turkish Government were terminated on the afternoon of January 29, when the Servian chargé d'affaires paid a visit to the chief of the Turkish delegates and delivered the following formal statement:

The plenipotentiaries of the Allied States, having since the suspension of the work of the Peace Conference awaited in vain for three weeks the reply of the Ottoman plenipotentiaries to their last demands, and the events occurring in Constantinople appearing to them to have destroyed the hope of arriving at the conclusion of peace, they, to their great regret, are obliged to declare the negotiations commenced in London on December 16 last broken off.

This document bore the signatures of all the representatives of the Balkan Allies. The British Government was thanked for its hospitality, and word was forwarded to the various Balkan capitals so that the officers might prepare for a renewal of the war. In spite of this rupture in the peace negotiations the opinion was expressed by some diplomats in London that further fighting might still be averted. The decision of the Allies was reached because of the remarkable and startling events which have taken place in the Turkish capital during the last few days. The Young Turks' Party, under the leadership of Enver Bey, succeeded by a startling coup d'état in forcing the resignation of the cabinet of which Kiamil Pasha was the grand vizier. This revolution, as it has been called, came as a protest of the younger and more militant element in Turkey against the decision of the ministry and the National Council to conclude peace with the Balkan League on terms which would include the surrender of Adrianople. A correspondent of one of the great London daily newspapers had wired an account of the events of that day as they came to his attention. He reports in part as follows:

"The first warning of danger was the appearance of Djemal Bey, vali of Adana, on horseback, accompanied by five mounted officers. As they rode into the Porte, a group, composed of about a dozen persons, started out of a café, unfurled a red and white flag, embroidered with texts from the Koran, and rushed up the steps. Parties of men, armed with revolvers, appeared from around every corner. A few were officers; others belonged to the Fedai element of the Committee of Union; others were roughs of the class employed by the committee for demonstrations against the Balkan legations. Their number did not exceed fifty, all told. They rushed up the steps with cries of 'Down with the government!' 'We will hold Adrianople!' and demanded to enter the Porte.

"At this moment Enver Bey and his uncle, Halil Bey, rode up and, entering the Porte, asked to see the grand vizier. I myself arrived at the Porte about an hour later, and had a good view of what was taking place. A group of about one hundred persons with a banner were standing on the steps. Among them were a number of well-known committeemen and several lemdjas, who were intoning their prayers. Whenever a pause took place in these pious exercises, the orators denounced the government and made patriotic speeches. The guard at the Porte stood at ease, watching the proceedings with vacant smiles or complete indifference.

"About one hundred more sympathizers were outside the gates cheering and handing around copies of a manifesto. The rest of the crowd assembled there appeared to be spectators. There were many officers among them. Some appeared pleased and some angry. The majority were indifferent. Within two streets of the disturbance no one seemed to know or care what was happening at the Porte. The fall of Kiamil Pasha and the installation of a new grand vizier were greeted with enthusiasm save by a few partisans."

Just as Enver Bey and his uncle entered the gates of the Sublime Porte an officer leaned from one of the windows of the office of War Minister General Nazim Pasha and fired at the intruders. They returned the fire and it is believed three officers were killed. One of these is known to have been the war minister himself. The representatives of the Young Turk Party insisted upon the resignation of the old cabinet, and proceeded with these documents in their pockets to the palace, where they were received by the Sultan. Many of the European despatches state that the Sultan was in favor of the more aggressive party, as he himself is anxious to save Adrianople for Turkey.

The new cabinet, which was appointed immediately, had hardly entered upon its duties before it commenced to experience difficulties. The large support which it was reported to have had seems to have disappeared. When the news of the change reached the Turkish army at Chatalja, there was an outbreak of mutiny. The latest reports which are at hand as this issue is prepared for the press state that forty-two officers were killed or wounded and that about one hundred and seventy wounded officers and men were removed from the camp. The same correspondent cables that on the following day numerous fights took place all along the Chatalja lines. He also reports that the Circassian battalion has resolved to avenge the death of Nazim Pasha. It is further stated that not more than twenty per cent. of the Turkish people are in favor of the new government or of a renewal of the war. One of the latest cablegrams says "Civil war seems imminent."

With the prospect of a renewal of the war at an early date and of further complications due to internal strife in Turkey, it is altogether impossible to foretell what will take place. The internal strife may in the end be a blessing for the depleted country and for Europe in general.

$3,000 ADDED TO THE RELIEF FUND IN THE HANDS OF THE BALKAN RELIEF COMMITTEE

THIS week another remittance of $3,000 is being forwarded to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Relief Committee in Sofia for use among the homeless and destitute in Bulgaria, Thrace, and Macedonia. Pastor Furnajieff and his helpers are pushing the relief work as energetically as possible. He has forwarded us more new photographs and these will be reproduced as rapidly as our space permits.

ABRAM AND LOT*

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

WHAT was the matter with Abram? We learn in our study to-day that Abram was not a perfect man, though he was the friend of God, and though God had prom- d that he should be the father of God's chosen ple (Gen. 17: 5). The Bible tells of only one n who was "without sin" (Heb. 4: 15). The s of all others are named for two reasons: to p us from being hero-worshipers, and as warn- s to us not to go and do likewise. Let us then condone sin because it is mentioned in the Bible t Abram, or Moses, or David did evil.

Abram did not trust God wholly or he would not ve left the land God had given to him and gone vn to Egypt when he found a dearth of food for family and his flocks. And it cannot be denied t Abram was guilty of lying en he was in Egypt (Gen. 12: 12). What he said was a half th, for Sarai was indeed his ter as well as his wife, the ughter of Abram's father, but t the daughter of his mother en. 20: 12). But this does not use Abram; he told a lie to ve his life, and thereby entan- d himself and Sarai with the g of Egypt—the Pharaoh—ich, but for peculiar leniency, uld have cost his life; instead, was deported, and his wife and that he had (Gen. 12: 18-20). ram returned to the south, in e region of Bethel.

He who lies to save life takes s case out of God's hands and ts it in the hands of the father lies instead. "All that a man th will he give for his life," ten quoted as God's truth, is the vil's lie—a lie that the whole ok of Job was written to re- te, and which every martyrdom d every battlefield of liberty oves to be a monstrous false- od. "Necessity knows no law," y the enemies of truth. But at is necessity? Luther could t be dissuaded from the jour- y to Worms, for he felt that it as his duty to go, even though expected the sentence of death be passed upon him. He said: t is necessary for me to go, it is not neces- ry for me to live." Said a thief, apologeti- lly, to the judge before whom he had been ought, "A man must live." "I do not see any cessity for it," replied the judge. Necessity is t against the truth, but for the truth. Let us t a watch against ourselves in this matter. Let l statements we make be within the truth. Every ild should be early educated to habits of accuracy statement, to leave a margin, a liberal margin, stead of outrageous exaggeration. Teach the ildren that a half truth is no better than a lie.

Here is a story for the children and grown-ups s well. "But, Tessie, you must know where you t it." "Deed, miss, I dunno no more'n de dade. nebber tuk it none, it jes comed." "Tessie," I id solemnly, "what will you do when God asks ou about this?" "I jes say, I dunno nuffin 'tall out it." "But you can't tell a lie to God, for he aw you take it." "Recken ye're out dar, 'cause it as as dark as Egyp." "But, Tessie," I said, "that akes no difference; God sees you all the time and nows what you do in the dark just as well as what ou do when it is light." The girl's expression changed, and she looked about her stealthily, as though in some dark corner she expected to see some one looking at her, and then she said, "Reckon ef I puts it back again in de dark, he'll see it?" "Yes, Tessie, God will see you whether you put it back at night or in the day." "Den it be all right?" "If you make up your mind never to take again what does not belong to you." "Sposen his head's turned round the wrong way, an' he don't see me?" "God's head is never turned round, Tessie; it is always toward us." Soon after dark I discovered Tessie on her way to my room with the little thermometer she had taken from it the night before. After that, there seemed to be a decided change in her, which pleased me much. One day I found her with a bottle of cologne in her hand; her back was turned and she did not see me, but I heard her say: "I reckon it smells kind o' good, and I reckon I'd like ter hab it, but de good God's a lookin' on, an' he might 'quire 'bout it some day."

THE SEPARATION OF ABRAM AND LOT

From an old Biblical illustration painted by Zuccarelli, and engraved on steel by J. Oatrim

What was the matter with Lot?

We seem to see Abram and Lot standing together in a field where the grass is not only parched, but has been cropped to the very roots by grazing animals. In the near distance is a spot slightly green and shepherds are quarreling with each other about whose sheep shall be allowed to be pastured upon it. Abram and Lot see that the quarrel is between their shepherds, and Abram is the first to say: "Let there be no strife, Lot, between thy herdsmen and my herdsmen. Is not the whole land before thee? Separate thyself from me; if thou wilt, take the left hand, then I will go to the right; or, if thou take the right hand, I will go to the left." It was noble for the older man to talk that way to the younger man. It was generous for the proprietor to make such a proposition to one who had no rights. If Lot had been equally noble and generous, he would have said: "You should have the first choice." But he did not do it. He looked to the north, to the south, to the west, and saw desolation; he looked to the east and saw the rich plains of Jordan and knew that there he should find abundant grass for his flocks and herds. And he said to Abram: "I will choose to go there." Then he and Abram separated. Abram remained a wanderer in Canaan, while Lot moved his tents to a place of plenty and set up his home among the vilest people of the world, those dwelling in Sodom. Selfishness and greed had taken deep root in Lot's heart; that is what was the matter with him.

> The man who lives for self alone
> Lives for the meanest mortal known.
> JOAQUIN MILLER.

In two weeks from now we shall have a lesson about how Lot fared in his chosen land. It was indeed a sorrowful experience for him. Selfishness and greed are twin brothers that were born many hundreds of years before Lot lived, in the time of Adam and Eve, Cain and Abel. They were not drowned in the flood, for they appear again in Noah and his descendants. When the grandson of Abram, Esau, was living, the twin brothers, Selfishness and Greed, were still upon the earth. They are in the world to-day, stronger and more powerful than ever. We shall need to be on constant watch to keep them from coming our way and taking up their abode with us. We shall not be able to escape them if we are intent on getting rich. But if riches come to us as a result of our success in business, or by legacy, we can keep these brothers from forming an intimate acquaintance with us by using freely of our wealth for the comfort and betterment of all mankind. Let us not be persuaded by greed and selfishness that we will enjoy our wealth by hoarding it, or by trying to spend it all on ourselves. A man worth fifty millions of dollars wrote to a friend: "I believe I am no better off, certainly no happier, than I was when I did not have a dollar to my name, and had to work from daylight until dark. I wore a good suit of clothes then, and I can only wear one suit now. I relished three good meals a day more than I do three meals a day now. I had fewer cases; I slept better, and I may add generally that I believe I was far happier in those days than I have been many times since I became a millionaire. And yet it is a comfortable feeling to be rich."

Another rich man said: "When we were poor, we looked forward to the time when we could have a summer home. But when we got rich enough to have one, we did not like going to the same place every summer because it was monotonous, and we looked forward to the time when we could have another for variety. Well, we got another, and then we began to look for a winter place, so that we would not have to be so much in the big house in the city. We've got them all now." "And are you happy?" "I suppose so, but we keep them all shut up most of the time, as we travel much in Europe." Is it not strange how greed and selfishness can deceive some people sometimes?

Many stories might be added to prove that not in the possession of much of this world's wealth alone lies happiness and contentment. Abram was very rich, but his wealth led only to strife till it was consecrated by his self-sacrifice and his willingness to overcome evil with good. In his unselfish generosity, Abram proved his love and service of God. He renounced his own rights, and, apparently, the divine promise on faith that thus all would be well.

* THE INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON for February 3, 1913. Abram and Lot. Gen. 13: 1-18. GOLDEN TEXT: "The blessing of Jehovah it maketh rich; and he addeth no sorrow therewith." Prov. 10: 22.

OUR SUNDAY SCHOOL SUPERINTENDENTS' ROUND TABLE

—HERE IS A LETTER from an earnest lady teacher of boys in West Virginia: "I read your suggestions concerning the work of a boy's Sunday school class in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and as I have a class of boys of fifteen, sixteen and seventeen years of age, I was greatly interested. We have recently organized our class, and have a social and business meeting at my home each month. The boys seem to take quite an interest in the work, and unless sickness prevents they come to Sunday school and church every Sunday. I find it quite a task to find something to entertain them at the monthly meeting, and if you could offer some suggestions I would be very thankful. I have had the class for nearly eight years, and am very much attached to them; but I feel the responsibility and am so anxious to see them go into the church and become Christian young men. Trusting I may receive some information and thanking you most sincerely. . . . "

To make the monthly business meeting of a class of rapidly developing boys not only pleasant socially but profitable spiritually and mentally one must put at least as much study into it, though of a different kind, as into a Sunday school lesson. The time ought not to be all used in mere business, though it is worth while to make it an occasion for teaching boys how to preside and move and second motions and make reports as committees. Let them feel that in doing this right they are learning to be useful citizens. The teacher should have some little book on parliamentary usage. The usual order for business meetings of religious bodies is: 1. Prayer; 2. Reading of minutes of last meeting; 3. Unfinished business (from last meeting, if any); 4. Reports of officers and committees and other new business (including elections, filling vacancies, etc.).

Following this I suggest that each boy in order be asked to contribute something under the head of "Entertainment"—a short story (read or recited), a song, a recitation, a joke, a picture (to pass around), or—best of all—some information gleaned from magazines or papers or by hikes as to "boys' work" or "work for boys," about which so much is being published to-day.

There should always be something that will kindle the altruism of the boys into an increased desire to be useful. One of the best means to this end is the reading of biographical sketches of boys who began even in youth a truly successful life. A good program could be made by assigning different boys to report on the best things found in the month in the papers taken in their homes—for example, one to report what he liked best in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in the month since the last meeting, reading or repeating from memory or in his own words whatever of the article could be put into two or three minutes. Others would report on Youth's Companion, Scientific American, World's Work, the World To-day, or the Literary Digest.

Teachers of boys should by all means write to Mr. C. C. Robinson, the International Secretary for Boys at Y. M. C. A. Headquarters, 124 East Twenty-eighth Street, New York City, and see any local boy secretary that is near enough to be interviewed.

POLLYANNA

Author of "The Story of Marco," "Into Still Waters," "The Transformation of Margaret," etc.

CHAPTER XXV

THE GAME AND ITS PLAYERS

IT WAS not long after John Pendleton's second visit that Milly Snow called one afternoon. Milly Snow looked very embarrassed when Miss Polly entered the room.

"I—I came to inquire for the little girl," she stammered.

"You are very kind. She is about the same. How is your mother?" rejoined Miss Polly, wearily.

"That is what I came to tell you—that is, to ask you to tell Miss Pollyanna," hurried on the girl, breathlessly and incoherently. "We think it's so awful—so perfectly awful that the little thing can't ever walk again; and after all she's done for us, too—for mother, you know; teaching her to play the game, and all that. And when we heard how she couldn't play it herself, poor little dear! I'm sure I don't see how she can, either, in her condition! But when we remembered all the things she'd said to us, (we thought if she could only know what she had done for us, that it would help, you know, in her own case, about the game, because she could be glad—that is, a little glad—" Milly stopped helplessly, and seemed to be waiting for Miss Polly to speak.

Miss Polly had sat politely listening, but with a puzzled questioning in her eyes. Only about half of what had been said had she understood. When the pause came she filled it with a quiet,

"I don't think I quite understand, Milly. Just what is it that you want me to tell my niece?"

"Yes, that's it; I want you to tell her," answered the girl, feverishly. "Make her see what she's done for us. I want her to know how different mother is—and me, too. I'm different. I've been trying to play it—the game—a little."

Miss Polly frowned. She would have asked what Milly meant by this "game," but there was no opportunity. Milly was plunging on again with nervous haste.

"You know nothing was ever right before — for mother. She always wanted 'em different. But now she lets me keep the shades up, and she takes interest in things—how she looks, and her nightdress, and all that. And she's actually begun to knit little things—reins and baby blankets for fairs and hospitals. And she's so interested, and so glad to think she can do it! And that was all Miss Pollyanna's doings, you know, 'cause she told mother she could be glad she'd got her hands and arms, anyway. And then mother began to—to knit, you know. And you can't think what a different room it is now, what with the red and blue and yellow worsteds, and the prisms in the window that she gave her! Why, it actually makes you feel better just to go in there now; and before I used to dread it awfully, it was so dark and gloomy, and mother was so—so unhappy, you know.

"And so we want you to please tell Miss Pollyanna that we understand it's all because of her. And please say that we're so glad we know her, that we thought, maybe, if she knew it, it would make her a little glad that she knew us. And—and that's all," sighed Milly, rising hurriedly to her feet. "You'll tell her?"

"Why, of course," murmured Miss Polly, wondering just how much of this remarkable discourse she could remember to tell.

These visits of John Pendleton and Milly Snow were only the first of many; and always there were the curious messages—more and more a puzzle to Miss Polly.

One day there was the little Widow Benton, by reputation the saddest little woman in town—one who was always in black. To-day, however, Mrs. Benton wore a knot of pale blue at the throat, though there were tears in her eyes. She spoke of her grief and horror at the accident; then she asked diffidently if she might see Pollyanna.

Miss Polly shook her head.

"I am sorry, but she sees no one yet. A little later—perhaps."

Mrs. Benton wiped her eyes, rose, and turned to go. But after she had almost reached the hall door she came back hurriedly.

"Miss Harrington, perhaps you'd give her a—a message," she stammered.

"Certainly, Mrs. Benton; I shall be very glad to."

Still the little woman hesitated; then she spoke.

"Will you tell her, please, that—that I've put on this," she said, just touching the blue bow at her throat. Then, at Miss Polly's obvious look of surprise, she added: "The little girl has been trying for so long to make me wear—some color, that I thought she'd be glad to know I'd begun. She said that Freddy would be glad to see it if I would. You know Freddy's all I have now. The others are all—" Mrs. Benton shook her head and turned away. "If you'll just tell Pollyanna, she'll understand." And the door closed after her.

A little later, that same day, there was the other widow; at least she wore widow's garments. Miss Polly did not know her at all. She wondered vaguely how Pollyanna could have known her. The lady gave her name as "Mrs. Tarbell."

"I'm a stranger to you, of course," she began at once. "But I'm not a stranger to your little niece, Pollyanna. I've been at the hotel all summer, and every day I've had to take long walks for my health. It was on these walks that I've met your niece—she's such a dear little girl! I wish I could make you understand what she's been to me. I was very sad when I came up here; and her bright face and cheery ways reminded me of—my own little girl that I lost years ago. I've been so shocked, ever since I knew of the accident; and then when I learned that the poor child would never walk again, and that she was so unhappy because she couldn't be 'glad' any longer—the dear child!—I just had to come to you."

"You are very kind," murmured Miss Polly.

"But it is you who are to be kind," demurred the other. "I—I want you to give her a message from me. Will you?"

"Certainly."

"Will you just tell her, then, that Mrs. Tarbell is glad now. Yes, I know it sounds odd, and you don't understand. But—if you'll pardon me, I'd rather not explain." Sad lines came to the lady's mouth, and the smile left her eyes. "Your niece will know just what I mean; and I felt that I must tell her. Thank you; and pardon me, please, for any seeming rudeness in my call," she begged, as she took her leave.

Thoroughly mystified now, Miss Polly hurried upstairs to Pollyanna's room.

"Pollyanna, do you know a Mrs. Tarbell?"

"Why, yes, I love Mrs. Tarbell. She's sick, and awfully sad, and she's at the hotel, and takes long walks. We go together. I mean—we used to." Pollyanna's voice broke, and two big tears rolled down her cheeks.

Miss Polly cleared her throat hurriedly.

"Well, she's just been here, dear. She left a message for you; but she wouldn't tell me what it meant. She llyanna clapped her hands softly. Did she say that, really? Oh, I'm o lad!"

But, Pollyanna, what did she n?"

Vhy, it's the game, and—" Pol- y na stopped short, her finger to e lips.

What game?"

N-nothing much, Aunt Polly, that s I can't tell it unless I tell other h gs that—that I'm not to—to k of."

was on Miss Polly's tongue to tion her niece further; but the ous distress on the little girl's a stayed the words before they w e uttered.

ot long after Mrs. Tarbell's visit th climax came. It came in the shape f call from a certain young woman w unnaturally pink cheeks and ab- n nally yellow hair; a young woman w wore very high heels and cheap e elry; a young woman whom Miss y knew very well by reputation, whom she was angrily amazed to t beneath the roof of the Harring- homestead.

liss Polly did not offer her hand. drew back, indeed, as she entered room.

he woman rose at once. Her eyes e very red, as if she had been cry- . Half defiantly she asked if she ht, for a moment, see the little . Pollyanna.

liss Polly said no. She began to it very sternly; but something in woman's pleading eyes made her the civil explanation that no one s allowed yet to see Pollyanna.

he woman hesitated; then, a little squely, she spoke. Her chin was l at a slightly defiant tilt.

My name is Mrs. Payson—Mrs. n Payson. I presume you've heard me—most of the good people in the n have—and maybe some of the ngs you've heard ain't true. But er mind that. It's about the little l I came. I heard about the acci- it, and—and it broke me all up."

he paused and cleared her throat, when she resumed, her voice was ll husky.

'Maybe you don't know it, but I've n a good deal of that little girl of rs. We live on the Pendleton Hill ad, and she used to come in and y with the kids and talk to me— d my man, when he was home. She med to like it, and to like me. She ln't know, I suspect, that her kind folks don't generally call on my d. Maybe if they did call more, ss Harrington, there wouldn't be so ny—of my kind," she added, with dden bitterness.

"Be that as it may, she came; and e didn't do herself no harm, and she l us good—a lot o' good. How much e won't know—nor can't know, I pe; 'cause if she did, she'd know her things—that I don't want her to ow.

"But it's just this. It's been hard nes with us this year, in more ways an one. We've been blue and dis- uraged, my man and me, and ready r—'most anything. We was reckon- g on getting a divorce about now, nd letting the kids—well, we didn't ow what we would do with the kids. hen came the accident, and what we ard about the little girl's never alking again. And we got to think- g how she used to come and sit on r doorstep and train with the kids, nd laugh, and—and just be glad. She as always being glad about some- ing; and then, one day, she told us hy, and about the game, you know; nd tried to coax us to play it.

"Well, we've heard now that she's retting her poor little life out of her, ecause she can't play it no more— hat there's nothing to be glad about. nd that's what I came to tell her to- ay—that maybe she can be a little glad for us, 'cause we've decided to stick to each other, and play the game ourselves. I knew she would be glad of that, because she used to feel kind of bad—at things we said, sometimes. Just how the game is going to help us, I can't say that I exactly see, yet; but maybe 'twill. Anyhow, we're going to try—'cause she wanted us to. Will you tell her?"

"Yes, I will tell her," said Miss Polly, a little faintly. Then, with sudden impulse, she stepped forward and held out her hand. "And thank you for coming, Mrs. Payson," she said simply.

The defiant chin fell. The lips above it trembled visibly. With an incoherently mumbled something, Mrs. Payson blindly clutched at the outstretched hand, turned, and fled.

The door had scarcely closed behind her before Miss Polly was confronting Nancy in the kitchen.

"Nancy!"

Miss Polly spoke sharply. The series of puzzling, disconcerting visits of the last few days, culminating as they had in the extraordinary experience of the afternoon, had strained her nerves to the snapping point. Not since Pollyanna's accident had Nancy heard her mistress speak so sternly.

"Nancy, will you tell me what this absurd 'game' is that the whole town seems to be babbling about? And what, please, has my niece to do with it? Why does everybody from Milly Snow to Mrs. Tom Payson send word to her that they're playing it? As near as I can judge, half the town are putting on blue ribbons, or stopping family quarrels, or learning to like something they never liked before, and all because of Pollyanna. I tried to ask the child herself about it, but I don't like to worry her—now. But from something I heard her say to you last night, I should judge that you were one of them, too. Now will you tell me what it all means?"

To Miss Polly's surprise and dismay, Nancy burst into tears.

"It means that ever since last June that blessed child has jest been makin' the whole town glad, an' now they're turnin' round an' tryin' ter make her a little glad, too."

"Glad of what?"

"Jest glad. That's the game."

Miss Polly actually stamped her foot.

"There you go like all the rest, Nancy. What game?"

Nancy lifted her chin. She faced her mistress and looked her squarely in the eye.

"I'll tell ye, ma'am. It's a game Miss Pollyanna's father learned her ter play. She got a pair of crutches once in a missionary barrel when she was wantin' a doll, an' she cried, of course, like any child would. It seems 'twas then her father told her that there wasn't anythin' but what there was somethin' about it that you could be glad about; an' that she could be glad about them crutches."

"Glad for—crutches!" Miss Polly choked back a sob—she was thinking of the helpless little legs on the bed upstairs.

"Yes'm. That's what I said, an' Miss Pollyanna said that's what she said, too. But he told her she could be glad—'cause she didn't need 'em."

"Oh-h!" cried Miss Polly.

"And after that she said he made a regular game of it—findin' somethin' in everythin' ter be glad about. An' she said you could do it, too; an' that you didn't seem ter mind not havin' the doll, 'cause you was so glad you didn't need the crutches. An' they called it the 'just bein' glad game.' That's the game, ma'am. She's played it ever since."

"Why, how—how—"

Miss Polly came to a helpless pause.

"An' you'd be surprised ter find how cute it works, ma'am, too," maintained Nancy, with almost the eagerness of Pollyanna herself. "I wish I could

There is Economy in Buying Heinz Baked Beans

BECAUSE baked beans give you more food value, as well as more satisfaction—more of the health-giving, strength-building elements your system requires. Far more than you obtain in the ordinary boiled or steamed beans so often sold in cans.

Heinz Baked Beans are really baked in ovens. They have all the flavor, all the delicacy, all the nutriment, of the famous baked beans of Boston.

Thousands of housewives all over the country will tell you that Heinz Baked Beans are "like the best home baked." And that's the highest praise we ask. Look on the label of the can of beans you buy for the word "Baked." The U. S. Government forbids its use when the beans are not baked. You will find every can of Heinz Baked Beans labeled "Baked."

57 Varieties

There are four kinds of Heinz Baked Beans:

Heinz Baked Beans with Pork and Tomato Sauce.

Heinz Baked Pork and Beans without Tomato Sauce—Boston Style.

Heinz Baked Beans in Tomato Sauce without Pork (Vegetarian).

Heinz Baked Red Kidney Beans.

Others of the famous "57" are:

Heinz Euchred Pickle, Mince Meat, Chili Sauce, Pure Vinegars, Tomato Ketchup, Fruit Preserves, Peanut Butter, etc.

They won't wear to holes. We guarantee that. If any do we replace them free. A guarantee ticket with 6 coupons attached is given with every 6 pairs sold. And this guarantee doesn't cover merely the heels and toes. Every stitch is protected.

By the number of Holeproof Hose we sell we figure that we have a million regular customers, men, women, children and infants. So many wouldn't buy a poor hose, or one that did not live up to the guarantee, in all of our thirteen years of "Holeproof" 95 per cent of the output has outlasted it. That means 24,700,000 pairs.

Holeproof Hosiery
FOR MEN WOMEN AND CHILDREN

The reason is this: We pay for Egyptian and Sea Island Cotton Yarn an average of 74c a pound.

We send to Japan for silk for the silk "Holeproof" and guarantee three pairs of these hose for three months for both men and women.

Don't darn longer—when there are hose like these at the price of common kinds.

Genuine "Holeproofs" bear this signature and are sold in your town. We'll tell you the dealers' names or request or ship direct where no dealer is near charges prepaid.

tell ye what a lot she's done for mother an' the folks out home. She's been ter see 'em, you know, twice, with me. An' she's made me glad, too, on such a lot o' things—little things an' big things; an' it's made 'em so much easier. There's Monday mornin's, that I used ter hate, so. She's actually made me glad for Monday mornin's."

"Glad—for Monday mornings!"

Nancy laughed.

"I know it does sound nutty, ma'am. But let me tell ye. That blessed lamb found out I hated Monday mornin's somethin' awful; an' what does she up an' tell me one day but this: 'Well, anyhow, Nancy, I should think you could be gladder on Monday mornin' than on any other day in the week, because 'twould be a whole week before you'd have another one!' An' I'm blessed if I hain't thought of it every Monday mornin' since—an' it has helped, ma'am. It made me laugh, every time I thought of it; an' laughin' helps, you know; it does, it does!"

"But why hasn't she told me the game," faltered Miss Polly, "instead of making such a mystery of it, when I asked her?"

Nancy hesitated.

"Beggin' yer pardon, ma'am, you told her not ter speak of—her father, so she couldn't tell ye. 'Twas her father's game, ye see."

Miss Polly bit her lip.

"She wanted ter tell ye first off," continued Nancy, a little unsteadily. "She wanted somebody ter play it with, ye know. That's why I begun it—so she could have some one."

"And—and—these others?" Miss Polly's voice shook now.

"Oh, everybody, 'most, knows it now, I guess. Anyhow, I should think they did from the way I'm hearin' of it everywhere I go. An' she was always so smilin' an' pleasant ter every one, an' so—so jest glad herself all the time, that they couldn't help knowin' it, anyhow. Now, since she's hurt, everybody feels so bad—specially when they heard how bad she feels 'cause she can't find anythin' ter be glad about. An' so they've been comin' every day ter tell her how glad she's made them, hopin' that'll help some. You see, she's always wanted everybody ter play the game with her."

"Well, I know somebody who'll play it—now," choked Miss Polly, as she sped through the kitchen doorway.

Behind her, Nancy stood staring amazedly.

"Well, I'll believe anythin'—anythin' now," she muttered to herself. "Ye can't stump me with anythin' I wouldn't believe now—o' Miss Polly!"

A little later, in Pollyanna's room, the nurse left Miss Polly and Pollyanna alone together.

"And you've had still another caller to-day, my dear," announced Miss Polly, in a voice that she vainly tried to steady. "Do you remember Mrs. Payson?"

"Mrs. Payson? Why, I reckon I do! She lives on the way to Mr. Pendleton's, and she's got the prettiest little girl baby three years old, and a boy 'most five. She's awfully nice, and so's her husband—only they don't seem to know how nice each other is. Sometimes they fight—I mean, they don't quite agree. They're poor, too, they say. But she wears real pretty clothes, sometimes. And she's got perfectly beautiful rings with diamonds and rubies and emeralds in them, but she says she's got one ring too many, and that she's going to throw it away sometime, and get a divorce, instead. What is a divorce, Aunt Polly? I'm afraid it isn't very nice, because she didn't look happy when she talked about it. And she said if she did get it, they wouldn't live there any more, and that Mr. Payson would go 'way off, and maybe the children, too. But I should think she'd rather keep the ring, even if she did have so many; shouldn't you? Auntie, what is a divorce?"

"But they aren't going 'way off, dear," interposed Aunt Polly, hurriedly. "They're going to stay right there together."

"Oh, I'm so glad! Then they'll be there when I go up to see—Oh dear!" broke off the little girl, miserably. "Aunt Polly, why can't I remember that my legs don't go any more, and that I won't ever, ever go up to see Mr. Pendleton again?"

"There, there, don't!" choked her aunt. "Perhaps you'll drive up some time. But listen! I haven't told you, yet, all that Mrs. Payson said. She wanted me to tell you that they—they were going to stay together and play the game, just as you wanted them to."

Pollyanna smiled through tear-wet eyes.

"Did they, really? Oh, I am glad of that!"

"Yes, she said she hoped you'd be. That's why she told you, to make you glad, Pollyanna."

Pollyanna looked up quickly.

"Why, Aunt Polly, you—you spoke just as if you knew—Do you know about the game, Aunt Polly?"

"Yes, dear." Miss Polly sternly forced her voice to be cheerfully matter-of-fact. "Nancy told me. I think it's a beautiful game. I'm going to play it now—with you."

"Oh, Aunt Polly—you? I'm so glad! You see, I've really wanted you most of anybody, all the time."

Aunt Polly caught her breath a little sharply. It was even harder this time to keep her voice steady; but she did it.

"Yes, dear, and there are all those others, too. Why, Pollyanna, I think all the town is playing that game now with you—even to the minister! I haven't had a chance to tell you, yet, but this morning I met Mr. Ford when I was down to the village, and he told me to say to you that just as soon as you could see him, he was coming to tell you that he hadn't stopped being glad yet over those eight hundred rejoicing texts that you told him about. So you see, dear, it's just you that have done it. The whole town is playing the game, and the whole town is wonderfully happier—and all because of one little girl who taught the people a new game, and how to play it."

Pollyanna clapped her hands.

"Oh, I'm so glad!" she cried. Then, suddenly, a wonderful light illumined her face. "Why, Aunt Polly, there is something I can be glad about, after all. I can be glad I've had my legs, anyway—else I couldn't have done—that!"

W., Greenville, Miss. 1. Were any of the sciples married? 2. What was "original n"?

Very little is known regarding the domestic ons of the apostles beyond what is dis- in the Gospels. Matt. 8: 15 clearly im- that Peter was married. Bartholomew is by tradition to have been the bridegroom e wedding at Cana, and Philip is men- by Clement of Alexandria as having had e and children. Nothing definite can be ssed concerning the others, although they enerally assumed to have been unmarried. riginal sin" is a term used in a two-fold to denote (1) the imputation of Adam's in of disobedience to his posterity, and (2) atural depravity which we derive by in- nce from our first parents. This doctrine des the whole of the sacred writings. en. 8: 21.

K. R., Saugerties, N. Y. Can you tell me here to get an old poem about Bill and oe, only one line of which I remember at nd of each verse, "When you were Joe and was Bill." Who was the author?

ll and Joe" is a famous poem by Oliver ell Holmes, by far too long to be given See any collection of Holmes's poetical s.

E. H., Allentown, Pa. 1 and 2. Denomina- nknown. 3. The sacrament is understood not merely a holy act, but a means of , wherein the Word of God is connected certain visible elements divinely pre- d. The Lutheran Church holds that what- is to be accepted as a sacrament must both an explicit divine command and ise, as well as some visible element, di- y prescribed and connected with the Word d. Penance or absolution, having no visi- lement, it finds as mere application to the idual of the Gospel. As regards the other ments believed in by the Roman Catholic ch, it finds no promise in Scripture that ese graces any spiritual gift is to be im- d.

F. J. G., Pawtucket, R. I. Please explain Cor. 15: 23, and I Thess. 4: 16.

ach in his own order" might be more ac- ely rendered "in his own rank"; this is, his own kind. Though all shall rise again, es not follow that all shall be saved. Each have his proper place, Christ first (Col.); after him the godly who died in Christ hess. 4: 16), but in a separate company the ungodly, and then the resurrection of rest of the dead. This order is borne out e passage in I Thess 4: 16, 17.

P., Springfield, Mass. "The Shrine of Juggernaut," a very interesting article in a recent issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, leads me to ask, is it not possible that this hideous and horrible idol means to its wor- shipers the image only of a supposed god existing in their heaven, so to speak? Do the heathen worship the actual idol, or the ideal it represents, as we, in our true light, love to look upon a beautiful statue or picture of Christ, directing and leading our thoughts to him? Does not the idol for the heathen mind have the same influences?

he idol Juggernaut or Jaggernaut (a cor- tion of the Sanskrit word Jagannatha, d of the world"), is simply a carved block wood with a frightful visage, painted black, with an open mouth of a bloody color. It robably the most typical heathen figure in tence. The origin of this idolatrous wor- is said to have been due to the dream of jah, who in his vision was told that on the hore he would find a piece of wood which the "true form of deity," and he was or- d to place it in a temple and worship it, ch he did. The heathen priests pronounced an incarnation of Vishnu, fashioned by wakarman, the architect of the gods, and inaugurated by the god Brahma. The worship of Juggernaut became notorious through the mad fanaticism of ignorant devotees who threw away their lives under the wheels of the chariot, in the hope of attaining eternal bliss. Some writers, however, maintain that such deaths were largely due to accident. Missionaries write that the actual idol itself and nothing else is the object of worship; it apparently represents no idea beyond that of blind heathenism and bloody sacrifice—a Moloch on wheels.

C. G., Amity, La. 1. Of the early history of Judas, before his name appears in the list of the apostles, nothing is known. The name "Iscariot" is variously explained, some writers holding that he was so called because he belonged to Kerioth in the tribe of Judah. He was drawn like others presumably by the preaching of the Baptist, and he responded to the call when Jesus organized his band of twelve apostles. He was made their treasurer, a position he may have coveted through the greed of gain. His disloyalty was evidently perceived by Jesus long before the consummation of his crime. That he had a love of money is shown in John 12: 4-6 and other passages. He was probably ambitious and, like several other apostles, believed that Jesus would set up an earthly kingdom in which he himself might have an influential post. Before the Last Supper he had made his treacherous bargain of betrayal, and Jesus knew his evil heart (John 13: 26, 27). 2. Hypnotism is not accepted as a science. At the present time it is largely in the hands of charlatans.

W. A., Owasso, Okla. 1. Why are the ten commandments read in different order in America than they are read in the European countries? 2. The first commandment is "Thou shalt have no other gods before me"; second, "Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain"; three, "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy," and these belong to the first table, to honor our God. Why can they say that to keep the Sabbath holy is the fourth or included in the second table?

The difference in the order of the ten commandments is not as between America and any European country, but between the Lutheran and Reformed churches, the Reformed churches making of the words "Thou shalt not make unto thyself any image" a second commandment, whilst the Lutheran catechism makes two commandments, the ninth and tenth, of the words "Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's house, or thy neighbor's wife," etc. The reason Luther did not enumerate as a second commandment the injunction against images is that he declared this merely as an example of transgression of the first commandment, and his reason for the ninth and tenth commandments, as given in the Lutheran catechism, is that the all-important thing is to understand that the law of God goes down to the heart.

J. C., Manvel, Tex. 1. It was the custom for the feet of guests to be washed by servants of the household, or even by members of the host's family on occasions where it was desired to specially honor the visitor. Foot-washing was a token of humble and affectionate attention. In Gen. 24: 32 we note that Abraham's servant was provided with water to wash his master's feet and the feet of those who were with him. Slaves were commonly employed at this duty. 2. As between a backslider and one who has never been converted, the case of the former would seem to be harder to reach. Having once known the joy of union with Christ and afterwards having fallen away, first through temptation, and then through deliberate yielding to sin, he has crucified his Lord afresh. There are many warnings in Scripture against apostasy, showing its awful consequences to one who, having once received spiritual enlightenment, has now fallen into sin and indifference.

L. M., Hyde Park, Vt. What is chinchilla?

The chinchilla itself is a little South American rodent which lives high up on the Andes Mountains. It has a bushy tail, very big ears and is covered with a soft gray fur which is much prized. This fur, and sometimes imitations of it, are made into coats which are called chinchilla. As the little Andean animals are becoming quite scarce, real chinchilla fur is much dearer than formerly.

F. H., Parkston, S. D. Please state how many Catholics there are under the American flag.

If all are reckoned who are counted by the hierarchy as belonging to that church (including baptized infants) the figures would show about fifteen millions for the United States, seven millions for the Philippines and one million for Porto Rico. The census authorities, we believe, deduct 15 per cent. for children under nine, as all other religious bodies only send returns of communicants. In the Presbyterian Standard, Charlotte, N. C., November 30, 1910, Dr. Ortz y Gonzales says: "Here as everywhere the Roman Catholic Church loses more than one-third of her membership in every generation," and Bishop McFaul, of Trenton, speaking at the St. Francis Xavier School commencement exercises on June 21, 1909, said: "We have had great losses in our faith. We should now number when you were a boy and suffered from colds or depressed health our doctor said—"give him SCOTT'S EMULSION," and it was always sufficient to relieve the cold and to restore the animated glow of buoyant health and so I say: the same tried and true remedy is more potent to-day than the syrups and nostrums of questionable ingredients and powerful drugs which excite the spirits, but blunt the faculties and are often more harmful than beneficial.

This health-giving food-tonic is the medical perfection of nature's material and scientific skill, and possesses nutritive qualities as beneficient to maturity as to childhood and contains no alcohol, no sugar or habit-forming drugs.

Scott's Emulsion strengthens the lungs and often prevents grippe and pneumonia.

half the population of the United States, or forty millions." In the Catholic Mind, November, 1912, the Rev. James Monaghan, S.J., throws a side light on Catholicity in the Philippines in these words (page 310): "There are six hundred thousand Catholic children in the public schools of the Philippines studying from English text-books and reciting their lessons in English, and scarce one of them has heard a word of Catholic instruction during the last fourteen years." As to Porto Rico, in an address in New York City, July 1, 1900, Rev. A. Lambert (formerly a Redemptorist priest) said: "When Dr. Carroll visited Porto Rico he saw the priest at Guayama, a town of 15,000 inhabitants. He had been there five years and his congregations had risen from 12 or 14 to 35. The doctor asked if all the population were Catholics. "Well," he said, "the mayor is a freethinker, but they all return to the Church when they come to die."

S. B., Smedley, Ind. Please explain what is meant by "the kingdom of God" and the "kingdom of heaven."

In the New Testament, these phrases, which frequently occur, are synonymous and signify the divine, spiritual kingdom, the glorious reign of the Messiah. In many passages in the Old Testament, it is frequently described as a coming golden age, when the true religion should be re-established in its pristine purity and universal peace and happiness should prevail. This was doubtless intended to be understood in a spiritual sense; but there were many who gave to the prophecy a wholly temporal meaning. Occasionally it is used in the personal sense, as in the passage, "the kingdom of God is within you," which means that where Christ reigns in the heart, the eternal life of the kingdom has already begun. Jesus distinctly stated that his kingdom was "not of this world," meaning that it had nothing in common with earthly powers and principalities, and took no account of gradations of rank. His kingdom on earth is composed of those who turn to God and whose faith and life remain true to him.

P. N., Steele, N. D. I have read in THE MAIL-BAG that the electron is the basal ingredient of matter. Please explain. Is the atom not the smallest particle?

The "electron hypothesis" is still in its infancy, and little can be said as yet; physicists are divided in opinion and a long time will probably elapse before there is a definite conclusion; that is, before the truth or falsity of the electron theory will be established. This theory teaches that the atoms which were formerly supposed to be simple bodies, incapable of subdivision, or bodies which at all events do not undergo division in the ordinary processes of nature, are really systems of considerable complexity, built up of thousands of still tinier "electrons," each of which is endowed with a permanent electric charge.

Miscellaneous

Mrs. M. B., Detroit, Mich. He has always been a Unitarian, nominally, at least. We have no data as to your other question.

F. H. E., Stoneham, Mass. The change in the Lord's Prayer from "debts" to "trespasses" is merely a variant, and has no definite authority. When the change was first used is uncertain.

Mrs. C. V., Center, N. D. You will find in the January 29 issue, page 87, the subject of living without sin discussed by a very able authority, who emphasizes the view frequently expressed in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD on this subject.

G. D., Philadelphia, Pa. Any contributions intended for the relief of the Bulgarians may be addressed to the Balkan Relief Fund, 92 Bible House, New York City. When transmitting money through the mails it is always better to register the letter, as it insures safe delivery.

W. S. H., Toms River, N. J. If the printed reports concerning the president of a theological seminary who denied the divinity of Christ are reliable, he is clearly out of place as a teacher of Christianity and should resign. That is the only honorable way left open for one who discards the basis of the religion he professes to represent. On the lecture platform, he would have the standing due to a free thinker; but in a Christian seminary, he is altogether out of place.

H. M. M., Sussex, N. J. Costa Rica is a charming country, and is the most flourishing of the Central American republics. The climate is mild and salubrious and the soil remarkably fertile. The inhabitants are chiefly descendants of Spaniards from Galicia. Some negroes (1,200) and half-breeds dwell on the coast-lands and there are about 5,000 civilized and 3,000 uncivilized Indians. There are many industries, chief of which are cocoa, coffee and banana plantations. There are also several factories turning out cotton and silk, and besides there are a lot of sugar refineries. A few gold mines are operated by American companies. The established religion is Roman Catholic; there are many Protestant churches.

The demand for TWILIGHT TALES has steadily increased since it was first published. A second edition was rapidly taken, and now a third is ready. If you have not already secured a copy, NOW is the time to get it.

THERE is a thread of pure gold running through the Twilight Tales from which the reader may divine the author's purpose in writing the book. It is the line of God's protecting love and care which encircles all who trust in Him, and the knowledge of which gives to even the smallest detail of everyday life a purpose and significance. She spreads before us the little daily drama, the heartaches, the disappointments, the sweet surprises and unexpected joys, the separations and the reunions, the cares and consolations of the household, the "journeys that end in lovers' meetings"—all are unrolled like a moving picture, with the vivid action of life itself. Mrs. Sangster has crowded the best heart and soul stories of her whole career into this book. Love, romance, self-denial, ambition and the success that true character commands are here pictured with a fragrant setting of American home-life in town and country.

THE VOICE OF THE NATION ON ROME

Catholic Interference in Politics

HAVING been a careful reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for a number of years and being especially interested in all that relates to the spread of the Gospel of Christ—according to his own word, essentially love of God and fellow man—I have noted with approval your fearless exposure of the political aspirations and propaganda of the Church of Rome in America. Every one in this country ought to have and legally has a right to worship God according to the dictates of his or her own conscience. Consequently I do not believe in attacking any church, or the membership of any church on account of doctrinal disagreement. But during more than fifty years of thoughtful observation and mingling among men, in newspaper offices and where I had large access to the news of the world, I long since came to the conclusion that the church which had profited most largely by this spirit of toleration and religious liberty, having become strong through the exercise of that freedom, is now seeking to take from others that liberty by which alone it has been enabled to obtain even a foothold in this country. It is the viper stinging the bosom that warmed and gave it new life, after other nations had repudiated it and cast it out as a factor in government affairs.

Of late years they have become bold enough at election times to claim, with a considerable degree of frankness, that town and city offices should come to them in full proportion to their numbers in the community; and while securing their nomination and openly seeking election as Democrats or members of whatever party might give them the most encouragement, have worked for votes on the ground that they were Catholics, and would strengthen their church if elected. Such a case may have occurred, but it has not come within my knowledge, where a Methodist, Baptist, or Presbyterian sought election to political office on the ground of sectarian affiliations. Doubtless, personal friendships and the confidence gained in his church relations may gain him some votes; but it is on personal and not sectarian grounds. It is on public measures and party policies that our political contests must be waged, and not on sectarian church relationships, if we are to maintain the integrity of our free institutions; and I believe the majority of Catholic laymen will agree with us on this point, and if the matter were presented to them in a clear light would resent the efforts of the hierarchy to abridge the liberty of conscience and "make America Catholic" by interference in our political affairs. I therefore hope you will continue to enlighten the people, and that other publications will take up the good work in the spirit of charity and fairness which you have manifested in the discussion thus far. May this government never become an ecclesiasticism of any kind, but ever remain a land where "all nations and kindreds and tongues" shall be at liberty to praise God in any way which appeals to their conscience and understanding. God speed you in your work. A. W. B.

Holbrook, Mass.

Romanism Versus the Law of the Land

THE writer, together with many thousands of your readers, has been greatly interested and much encouraged by the attitude you have taken in relation to the Roman Catholic Church and her law-defying practices. Only very recently two cases have come under our notice, and we presume there are tens of thousands almost identical.

A young man, not a Catholic and not identified with any denomination, was married to a young woman, a nominal Catholic. She does not claim to live up to the teachings of her church. She was married by a Protestant minister. The husband stoutly refused to submit to any such thing as a priest. Less than four weeks after the marriage that young woman, who had until now received no attention from the priest (who never apparently had given her a thought, for she had not been in his church for eight months for the purpose of worship), received a call from the priest, who in no uncertain terms let her know that she had not been "married at all," that she was living "in sin"; that if any children came they would be "born out of wedlock"; that she must be married again in order that the blessing of the church might rest upon her and her offspring. The young bride was frightened and in agony. She began a persistent appeal to her husband to go with her and have their marriage "blessed." He has, we understand, yielded reluctantly, and will, some day in the near future, submit to the humiliation of re-marriage by a priest for whom he has no feeling but the most profound disgust.

The laws of Michigan, like the laws of all our States, recognize the legality of the marriage of these two young people. Now, what sort of an institution is this that comes in and sets aside the laws of the State, makes two young people wretched, and insists that it alone has the power to perform the marriage ceremony legally?

In the other case, after three children had come to the home, the young mother was driven to the verge of insanity by the hounding priest, and the husband was fairly forced to yield to save the happiness of his home and the mental balance of his wife, and so this marriage had to be "blessed" by the priest. Is it not time that so hot and so vigorous a protest arise against the assumption of power that Rome will tremble as she did when Luther's hammer was heard against the church door, startling the world to thoughts of liberty and life?

C. W. STEPHENSON,
Pastor First Methodist Protestant Church, Detroit.

Sample Copies Free on Application

HERE is an interesting suggestion for those who are interested in the Romanist campaign to make America Catholic. It comes from one of our subscribers.

I note that you state in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD that you are going to have discussions on the Roman Catholic problem in your paper throughout the year.

I wanted to inquire if you do not have some arrangement by which those desiring to help in this work could have you mail sample copies of your paper to names and addresses of friends who would be greatly interested in this feature. I made this inquiry because I know of other papers doing this kind of work and find the plan a good one. For, as you say in your paper, the whole nation needs enlightenment on this subject. Yours very truly,

H. S. G.

For the benefit of subscribers and others who may be interested, we desire to say that it would give us pleasure to mail free sample copies of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to any names which are furnished us by a subscriber. The issue, as presented in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD from week to week, has attracted a great deal of attention. All persons who are in sympathy are invited to send us a list of names of friends or acquaintances who should be enlightened concerning the political activities of the Roman hierarchy.

"Saved from the Protestants"

DURING the year ladies and gentlemen engaged in this good work [attending Liverpool police courts] have helped in various ways some twelve thousand Catholics of both sexes who were on the downward grade from poverty or crime, and have saved many such from the clutches of the various Protestant missionaries who infest these courts, and are ever on the watch to proselytize among the unfortunate.—London Correspondent New Orleans Morning Star, January 18, 1913.

A CONSECRATED THANK-OFFERING

A READER of this paper in Alberta, Canada, writes: "A year and a half ago, some unknown friend subscribed to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for me. I have derived so much pleasure and uplift from your paper that I want to help you along. For the last ten years I have struggled for a bare existence; but at last things are brightening up, and I send you the first fruits to be used as a thank-offering. Hence the draft for $100 enclosed. I leave the disposal of it in your hands. I should like some of it to go to the Bread Line, Mont-Lawn, and the Balkan Relief Fund. If you know of other objects, individual or otherwise, of pressing need, you can apply some of it to them."

(Signed)
"ONE OF THE CHRISTIAN HERALD FAMILY."

This beautiful gift, an acknowledgment of God's goodness and blessing, has been applied in accordance with the wishes of the donor in the following proportions:

Balkan Relief Fund (as the most immediately urgent cause)	$50.00
Bowery Mission Bread Line	25.00
Mont-Lawn Children's Home	25.00

The letter itself is a convincing testimony to the results of spiritual influence on the heart and life of the writer, who, in his prosperity, has not forgotten the call of those who are not equally fortunate, nor the Gospel admonition to "remember the poor."

MR. ABRAHAM MESEROLE of New York City, who passed away on October 18, 1912, was a friend and supporter of the Bowery Mission, and during his lifetime was a valued patron of its philanthropic work. At his death he left a check for $2,000 with instructions that it should be sent to the Mission as a memorial. Mrs. Meserole, his executrix, on January 17, 1913, forwarded her husband's gift, which will be applied to the work of the Mission. The trustees and superintendent have forwarded their grateful acknowledgments for this timely and generous offering.

Why He Made Good

THE new minister in a Georgia church was delivering his first sermon. The darkey janitor was a critical listener from a back corner of the church. The minister's sermon was eloquent, and his prayers seemed to cover the whole category of human wants.

After the services one of the deacons asked the old darkey what he thought of the new minister. "Don't you think he offers up a good prayer, Joe?"

"Ah mos' suhtainly does, boss. Why, dat man axed de Lord fo' things dat de odder preacher didn't even know he had!"

AT SIXTY-TWO

JUST sixty-two? Then trim thy light,
And get thy jewels all reset;
'Tis past meridian, but still bright,
And lacks some hours of sunset yet.
At sixty-two
Be strong and true,
Scour off the rust and shine anew.

'Tis yet high day; thy stuff resume,
And fight fresh battles for the truth;
For what is age but youth's full bloom,
A riper, more transcendent youth?
A wedge of gold
Is ever old;
Streams broader grow as downward rolled.

At sixty-two life is begun;
At seventy-three begin once more;
Fly swiftly as you near the sun,
And brighter shine at eighty-one.
At ninety-five,
Should you arrive,
Still wait on God, and work and thrive.

DAILY MEDITATION
FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR
BY REV. J. H. JOWETT, D. D.

SUNDAY, February 16. Isaiah 51: 1-6. Here is a sentence from Lord Morley: "If a man is despondent about his work the best remedy I can prescribe for him is to turn to a good biography." He counsels him to go into the yesterdays to find inspiration for the life of to-day. Other men's attainments are bugle calls to me. "Look unto Abraham your father." Look unto the blessings which waited upon his obedience! See how springs of refreshment broke out in the troubled way! God "called him and blessed him." Rekindle your hope at his radiant triumph. Strengthen your will in his glorious persistence.

Here do I see God's mercy in the gift of memory and in the witness of history. I can turn to the yesterdays for light and quickening. "Do ye not remember the miracle of the loaves?" Yes, I can recall the grace that met me in my need, the power that made the crooked straight and the rough places plain. And I am privileged to turn the pages of other men's testimonies and read the record of the Lord's dealings with them. And so do memory and history come as helpful angel-presences to my soul.

His love in the past
Forbids me to think
He'll leave me at last
In trouble to sink.

MONDAY, February 17. Genesis 13: 1-9. There is nothing more divisive than wealth. As families grow rich their members frequently become alienated. It is rarely indeed that love increases with the increase of riches. Luxurious possessions appear to be a forcing-bed in which the seeds of sleeping vices waken into strength. For one thing, selfishness is often quickened with success. Plenty, as well as penury, can "freeze the genial currents of the soul." And with selfishness comes a whole brood of mean and petty dispositions. Envy comes with it, and jealousy, and a morbid sensitiveness which readily leaps into strife.

So do our possessions multiply our temptations. So does the bright day "bring forth the adder." So do we need extra defenses when "fortune smiles upon us." But our God can make us proof against "the fiery darts" of success. Abram remained unscathed in "the garish day." The Lord delivered him from "the destruction that wasteth at noonday." His wealth increased, but it was not allowed to force itself between his soul and God. In the midst of all his prosperity he dwelt in "the secret place of the Most High," and he abode in "the shadow of the Almighty."

TUESDAY, February 18. Genesis 13: 10-18. Look at Lot. He was a man of the world, sharp as a needle, having an eye to the main chance. He boasted to himself that he always "took in the whole situation." He said that what he did not know was not worth knowing. But such "knowing" men have always a very imperfect sight. Lot saw "all the well-watered plain of Jordan," but he overlooked the city of Sodom and its exceedingly wicked and sinful people. And the thing he overlooked was the biggest thing in the outlook! It was to prove his undoing, and to bring his presumptuous selfishness to the ground.

Look at Abram. His spirit was cool and thoughtful, unheated by the feverish yearning after increased possessions. He had a "quiet eye," the fruit of his faithful communion with God. He was more intent on peace than plenty. He preferred fraternal fellowship to selfish increase. And so he chose the unselfish way, and along that way he discovered the blessing of God. "The Lord is mindful of his own. He remembereth his children." In the unselfish way we always enjoy the divine companionship, and in that companionship we are endowed with inconceivable wealth.

WEDNESDAY, February 19. Matthew 6: 26-33. Think of Lot and then think of a lily of the field! Think of the feverishness of the one and of the serenity of the other, or think of the ugly selfishness of the one and of the graceful beauty of the other! Look upon avarice at its worst, upon a Shylock, and then gaze upon a lily of the field! How alarming is the contrast! The one is self-made, guided by vicious impulses: the other is the handiwork of God. The one is rooted in self-will: the other is rooted in the power of the divine grace. God has nothing to do with the one; he has everything to do with the other. So one becomes "big" and ugly, the other grows in strength and beauty.

Now the wonder is this: that we too may be rooted in the power from which the lily draws its grace. We may draw into our souls the wealth of the Eternal, even the unsearchable riches of Christ. We may put on "the beauty of holiness." We may become clothed in the graces of the Spirit. When we are in the field of the lilies we may appear unto the Lord as kindred flowers of his own garden.

"He that abideth in me, and I in him, the same bringeth forth much fruit." "Rooted in him" we shall "grow up in all things unto him."

THURSDAY, February 20. I John 2: 13-17. No man can love two opposites any more than he can walk in contrary directions at the same time. No man can at once be mean and magnanimous, chivalrous and selfish. We cannot at the same moment dress appropriately for the Arctic region and the tropics. And we cannot wear the habits of the world and the garments of salvation. When we try to do it the result is a wretched and miserable compromise. I have seen a shopkeeper on the Sabbath day put up one shutter, out of presumed respect for the holy Lord, and behind the shutter continue all the business of the world. That one shutter is typical of all the religion that is left when a man "loves the world" and delights in its prizes and crowns. His religion is a bit of idle ritual which is an offense unto God.

So I must take my choice. Shall I travel north or south? Which of the two opposites shall I love—God or the world? Whichever love I choose I will drive out and quench the other. And thus if I choose the love of God it will destroy every worldly passion; and the river of my affections and desires will be like "the river of water of life, clear as crystal."

THE AIM OF THE EQUAL SUFFRAGISTS

the make-up of the great body of American women.

Women constitute from two-thirds to three-fourths of the church membership. Therefore, as a class, they are more religious than men. Prison statistics show that our prison population consists of 5½ per cent. women and 94½ per cent. men. Therefore, women as a class are more moral than men.

The population of our infirmaries, free lodging houses, Keeley Institutes and the like, is largely made up of men. Our great army of tramps, loafers and vagrants are men. Therefore, women as a class are more industrious than men.

There are more girls in our schools than boys. The high schools are graduating two and even three times as many girls as boys. The number of girls who attend college is increasing faster than the number of boys. Three times the Nobel prize has gone to a woman. Women as a class are fast becoming better educated than men.

Of the 307 occupations followed by men, women are in all but nine. Women have made good in all the professions. Therefore, women as a class have some business ability.

According to numberless statements of business men and employers, women are more trustworthy than men.

Most of the liquor consumed in this country is drunk by men. If piety, morality, sobriety, business and mental ability, industry, honesty and genius do not constitute mental fiber of the right sort to be used in government we give it up.

I gather from Mrs. Dodd's fulmination that the women expect to take this government over bodily into their own hands and just run it to suit their own dear selves; that the poor men, deprived of their accustomed work, will degenerate and become pitiful, driveling, paralyzed, palsied objects, just too disgusting to have around! And we shall become that awful thing—a "hen-pecked" nation! But in the very next sentence she proceeds unconsciously to demolish the "bogie man" she has conjured up. Listen! "Women are by nature more cautious than men. Therefore, while they are 'making up their minds,' real progress passes and they are left to follow, not to lead." A bad cause makes bad logic.

As to what women have done or have not done where they have the ballot, Mrs. Dodd's case is not strengthened by quoting inaccuracies and misrepresentations that have been discredited again and again, and which have no more weight with people who have informed themselves on the subject than one of Baron Munchausen's tales.

Equal suffragists are not asking for the ballot upon a plea of what they will do with it, but because it is their just right as human beings. They are not asking to control the government; they are asking for a legitimate part in it for the same reasons that such a concession is granted to men. They need the ballot to preserve their homes. Public-spirited women want to vote not because they wish to do the work of men, or to take over men's affairs. They do want an opportunity to do their own work most effectively and to take care of those affairs which naturally and historically belong to women, but which are constantly being overlooked and slighted in our political institutions. Besides, they are tired of being aliens in their own homeland.

I heard a remark made by one of the men in our town after listening to the slurs and sneers and innuendos of an anti-suffragist speaker which I commend to Mrs. Dodd's thoughtful consideration: "It's a poor cause that has to be bolstered by the vilification of your own sex."

TWILIGHT TALES INTERESTING

Twilight Tales came promptly to hand, for which please accept my thanks. Like everything else from the versatile pen of Margaret Sangster, it has been interesting reading from start to finish. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is carefully read, and always enjoyed by our family, and then "passed on" for others to enjoy.

DAILY MEDITATION

FRIDAY, February 21. Psalm 107: 33-43. "He turneth . . . the dry ground into watersprings." This is one of the miracles of grace. The good Lord makes a dry experience the fountain of blessing. I pass into an apparently waste place and I find riches of consolation. Even in "the valley of the shadow" I come upon "green pastures" and "still waters." I find flowers in the ruts of the hardest roads if I am in "the way of God's commandments." God's providence is the pioneer of every faithful pilgrim. "His blessed feet have gone before." What I shall need is already foreseen, and foresight with the Lord means forethought and provision. Every hour gives the loyal disciple surprises of grace.

Let me therefore not fear when the path of duty turns into the wilderness. The wilderness is as habitable with God as the crowded city, and in his fellowship my bread and water are sure. The Lord has strange manna for the children of disappointment, and he makes water to "gush forth from the rock." Duty can lead me nowhere without him, and his provision is abundant either in "the thirsty desert or the dewy mead." There will be a spring at the feet of every hill, and I shall find "lilies of peace" in the lonely valley of humiliation.

SATURDAY, February 22. Deuteronomy 8: 11-20. "Beware . . . lest when thou hast eaten and art full . . . thine heart be lifted up, and thou forget the Lord thy God." I was in a little cottage near Warwick. I said to the good man who lived in it, "Can you see the castle?" And he replied, "We can see it best in the winter when the leaves are off the trees. In the summer time it is apt to be hid!" The summer bounty hid the castle: the winter barrenness revealed it! And so it is in life. In the season of fulness we are prone to be blind to "the house of many mansions," and we forget the Master of the house, the Lord our God. Our material wealth hides our eternal treasure.

What shall we do in the days of our prosperity, when all our trees are in full leaf? We must pray that material things may never become opaque, that they may be always transparent, so that through the seen we may behold the unseen. This is a gift of the Spirit, and it may be ours. He will anoint our eyes with the eye-salve of grace, and everything will become to us a symbol of something better, so that even in the midst of material plenty our hearts will be with our treasure in heaven. Everything will be to us "as it were transparent glass."

These Daily Meditations will appear in each issue through 1913.

A Veteran's Misfortunes

MAJOR-GENERAL DANIEL E. SICKLES, battle-scarred veteran and hero of Gettysburg, has fallen on evil days in his old age. For the past year or so troubles have fallen thick and fast upon him, but the plucky old soldier, true to his nature and reputation, has borne up against them and still defiantly, at the age of ninety-three, looks fate in the face. An unlucky fate was near getting the upper hand of him the other day when the attorney-general of New York State obtained an order from an Albany justice for the arrest of the hero charging the conversion of funds entrusted to him as chairman of the monument commission which has charge of the erection of monuments to New York volunteers on battlefields of the Civil War. The legislature appropriated some $500,000 for this commission. It is alleged that $445,641 of this sum was turned over to Sickles and that his vouchers show an expenditure of only $419,122, leaving a deficit of $28,746. The sheriff of New York, an old friend of the general, reluctantly proceeded to carry out the arrest, and bring the aged veteran to the debtor's prison in Ludlow Street from his home on Fifth Avenue. Fortunately at the last moment a bail-bond was secured, and the general was saved the ignominy of being placed behind the bars. Mrs. Longstreet, widow of the famous general who opposed Sickles at Gettysburg, has written to say that if given time she will raise among the veterans of the South, whom Sickles defeated, the amount necessary to extricate him from his difficulties. The immediate troubles of the general were precipitated by the closing in February, 1912, of the Universal Trust Company, of which he was president. The Bowery Savings Bank then held a mortgage for $118,000 on his Fifth Avenue residence, and this would have been foreclosed had not his second wife, from whom he has been long estranged, come to his assistance, together with his son, Stanton Sickles. Both wife and son have refused to act further in the affairs of the general, nor has the old man invited their approaches in his most recent trouble. Major-General Sickles was one of the most illustrious soldiers of the Civil War on the Union side. He lost a leg at Gettysburg. He also distinguished himself in the diplomatic service, and represented this country at Madrid, where he met and married his second wife, from whom he is now separated.

Among the Workers

It has been twenty-seven years in active work, and thousands of immigrants have been its beneficiaries. —EVANGELIST FRANCIS E. SMILEY, of Denver, has just closed a week of special services at Timnath, Colo. Thirty-eight professed conversion, and thirteen were baptized, several being heads of families. Among them were a grandfather and grandmother, with their daughter and son-in-law, who brought their three children for baptism. Another entire family of five united.

You Can Weigh what you Should Weigh

My pupils are among the most refined, intellectual women of America. They have regained health and good figures and learned to keep well. Each has given me a few minutes a day in the privacy of her own room to following scientific, hygienic principles of health, prescribed to suit each individual's need.

You Can Be Well

My work has grown in favor because results are quick, natural and permanent and because they are scientific and appeal to common sense.

I have rounded out and Increased the Weight of as many more—all this by strengthening nerves, heart, circulation, lungs and vital organs so as to regulate the assimilation of food.

I want to help every woman to realize that her health lies, to a degree, in her own hands, and that she can reach her ideal in figure and poise.

Won't you join us?—we will make you and the world better.

I have published a free booklet showing how to stand and walk correctly, and giving other information of vital interest to women. Write for it and I will also tell you about my work.

A DIFFERENCE

It Paid This Man to Change Food

"What is called 'good living' eventually brought me to a condition quite the reverse of good health," writes a N. Y. merchant.

"Improper eating told on me till my stomach became so weak that food nauseated me, even the lightest and simplest lunch, and I was much depressed after a night of uneasy slumber, unfitting me for business.

"This condition was discouraging, as I could find no way to improve it. Then I saw the advertisement of Grape-Nuts food, and decided to try it, and became delighted with the result.

"For the past three years I have used Grape-Nuts and nothing else for my breakfast and for lunch before retiring. It speedily set my stomach right and I congratulate myself that I have regained my health. There is no greater comfort for a tired man than a lunch of Grape-Nuts. It insures restful sleep, and an awakening in the morning with a feeling of buoyant courage and hopefulness.

"Grape-Nuts has been a boon to my whole family. It has made of our 2-year-old boy, who used to be unable to digest much of anything, a robust, healthy, little rascal weighing 32 pounds. Mankind certainly owes a debt of gratitude to the expert who invented this perfect food." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. "There's a Reason."

CHARGE OF THE SCOTS GRAYS AT WATERLOO

WELLINGTON held this regiment of cavalry in reserve at the Battle of Waterloo, awaiting the supreme moment when an overwhelming charge might turn the tide of battle. The instant the French lines wavered the order was given to charge, and the Scots Grays Cavalry hurled themselves against the French like a thunderbolt. This charge ended forever the career of Napoleon, and his dream of universal empire vanished away with the smoke of his artillery. The celebrated picture shown herewith, from Ridpath's History, the original of which was purchased by Queen Victoria, and is now owned by King George of England, illustrates but ONE event of all the THOUSANDS which make up the history of every nation, empire, principality or power in the world-famed publication for Dr. Ridpath's enviable position as an historian is his wonderfully beautiful style, a style no other historian in any generation has ever equaled. He pictures the great historical events as though they were happening before your eyes; he carries you with him to see the battles of old; to meet kings and queens and warriors; to sit in the Roman senate; to march against Saladin and his dark-skinned followers; to sail the southern seas with Drake; to circumnavigate the globe with Magellan; to watch that thin line of Greek spearmen work havoc with the Persian hordes on the field of Marathon; to know the past as you know the present. He combines absorbing interest with supreme reliability and makes the heroes of history real living men and women, and about them he weaves the rise and fall of empires in such a fascinating style that history becomes as absorbingly interesting as the greatest of novels. Hundreds who read this have decided to buy Ridpath some day; now is the time. No need for us to tell you about Ridpath. The English-speaking world has pronounced this the only history of the world worth having. It is endorsed by Public Men, Educators, Business Men, the Clergy and everybody who knows history.

THE REASON

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

Why You Ought to Buy Ridpath's History Now

Because it is the only general history recognized everywhere as authority.

Because it is complete. It begins with the oldest civilization and gives the complete history of every country and every race; in fact, the history of mankind, including all achievements in war, discovery, invention, art, science, religion, philosophy and government.

Because it is the most beautifully illustrated of any historical work ever issued. It contains more than 2,000 illustrations. A famous educator has said that he considers the illustrations alone worth the entire cost of the set.

Because it will not only interest and instruct the average man or woman, but it will delight the children. It is so beautifully written that children will learn to love history reading. It will start them along the line of reading good things, of becoming interested in that which is true instead of reading novels and trashy literature.

Because the new ninth volume tells the story of recent, we might almost say, current events. It gives the complete history of the Boer War, the Spanish-American War, and the more recent Russia Japan War. It brings the history of every nation right down to date.

Because Ridpath's History of the World is absolutely accurate and thoroughly reliable. Dr. Ridpath spent the span of an ordinary lifetime in writing the work.

Because this is your chance to buy it at a nominal price—much less than the work has ever been offered before or ever will be offered again—and you may pay in small sums monthly if you prefer

From the original painting by Gari Melchers

The Christian's Work*

THE year's lessons began with the study of the "Ideal Christian's" consecration; the next we studied his zeal; to-day we consider "his practical service."

What is the actual thing that a Christian is supposed to be doing? About other lines of activity there is usually little or no doubt. The soldiers of the Balkan allies have had no doubt at all as to what they were expected to do. They were to defeat the Turks. The student is to master the lessons assigned; the blacksmith is to shoe horses and do various forms of iron work; the doctor is to make people well; the grocer is to sell groceries. But the Christian—what is he to do? What is his business?

His first and most important duty is to persuade others to accept Christ. If we are not careful we are apt to get our ideas of service rather blurred. We put things of distinctly minor importance into or near first place. The business of a Christian is to get others to become Christians. "Now then," Paul declares, "we are ambassadors for Christ, as though God did beseech you by us; we pray you in Christ's stead, be ye reconciled to God." "Christ in you, the hope of glory, whom we preach, warning every man, and teaching every man in all wisdom, that we may present every man perfect in Christ Jesus. Whereunto I also labor, striving according to his working, which worketh in me mightily." (II Cor. 5: 20; Col. 1: 28, 29.)

I am a stranger here,
Within a foreign land;
My home is far away,
Upon a golden strand.
Ambassador to be,
Of realms beyond the sea.

I'm here on business for the King,
This is the message that I bring;
A message angels fain would sing:
O be ye reconciled! Thus saith my Lord, the King,
O be ye reconciled to God.

That is "The King's Business," and however many other things we may be doing, if we are not really persuading others to yield to his appeals we are failing of our real mission.

A most important part of the work of soul-winning is the act of testimony. The surest way to get people to adopt a proposed plan of action is to tell them that it worked well in your case. If a medicine cures you, some one who suffers as you suffered will be led to try it when you tell him what it did for you. One of the striking signs of a certain popular remedy was a card displayed in cars and elsewhere: "—— cured one million headaches last year." Without entering at all into the question of the advisability of going after a headache in this particular fashion, it must be acknowledged that that is a very strong advertisement. If a man suffering from headache were looking at one of those signs, and a friend or stranger, also looking at it, should say, "Yes. One of those million headaches was mine; I had a furious one last month and that medicine took it away," the appeal of the advertisement would be strengthened immeasurably. Can you add to the claim of the Christian Church: "The Gospel of Christ has healed millions of broken and sinful hearts," the testimonial, "One of them was mine"?

That is how Christianity spread from the beginning. The early Christians went everywhere telling what Jesus of Nazareth had actually done for them. Whom are you telling about it to-day?

But the value of testimony for the work of soul-winning is only a part of its real purpose. Testimony helps other Christians; it strengthens their faith; it makes them open their hearts to new spiritual joys; it gives them new power for their work; it helps the one who gives the testimony; it brings glory to the name of Christ and honors him.

Then there are the other forms of

The Pictorial Life of Christ While THE CHRISTIAN HERALD produces many books, most of them of good quality of workmanship, this is easily the superior of them all. When we secured the right of publication and set about the work of production, several months ago, we brought to the task all the loving care and forethought that we could expend on a book that dealt with the greatest theme in the world—the Life of our Saviour on earth. In the reproduction of Mastroianni's sculptures, we spared no expense. The engravings are the finest that can be produced; the paper of the best quality for work of this class; even the inks were chosen with a care such as we have bestowed on no other work, and this applies to both letterpress and illustrations. Its covers are a triumph of the binder's art, beautiful in design, chaste and appropriate in finish.

We will send Free as an Easter Gift "The Pictorial Life of Christ" to any friend for two NEW yearly subscriptions to The Christian Herald at $1.50 each. Or, we will send "The Pictorial Life of Christ" to a friend and renew your own subscription for only $3

Christian work growing out of t broad, universal application of Chri tianity to all the needs and interes of life. Never did the church of Jes have a finer chance than it has now prove its divine origin and its right the first place in the interests of a people. The church has the answer t the practical problems that are di tressing society now. Every Christia should be busy helping to heal th hurts, to right the wrongs, to suppl the needs, spiritual, mental and phys cal, of suffering humanity. Nor shoul we forget the simple duties nearest a hand, of being kind, sweet, cheerfu helpful to the members of our ow households and the close circle of ou daily companions.

The Labors of Jesus*

JESUS was a worker. "I must work the works of him that sent me while it is day," he declared. "The night cometh when no man can work." He worked as a carpenter; he worked as a preacher and organizer; he worked as a healer; he labored in the highest task of which humanity is capable—prayer for others. We know that his activities took other forms, but these are especially referred to in our Scripture references.

It is taking the world many centuries to find out what kind of a man Christ was. Earlier artists, so many of whom strove to reproduce his face and figure, were inclined to overemphasize his gentleness, his tenderness. He was tender and gentle, but he was magnificently strong and energetic. There is a peculiar fitness in studying with special earnestness just now the subject of Christ as a laborer. Never was labor so honorable; never before has so much thought been put forth on the problems of labor nor such serious effort made to give it its true place in life and laborers their due rights.

Jesus is the Prince of Laborers, as he is the Prince of every pure and just sphere of human life. To keep step with him means to be a hard worker. He will assign our task; he will show us how to do it; he will give us the strength we need. "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might."

* EPWORTH LEAGUE TOPIC for Sunday, March 2, 1913, "The Labors of Jesus." Mark 1: 14: Luke 10: 1; Matt. 12: 15; Mark 14: 32-34.

Have You a Question?

We invite the members of the young people's societies to send us questions regarding their work. The problems of keeping up the activity and efficiency of the young people's society, particularly its spiritual work, are often perplexing, and local leaders would like to have practical advice from trained and experienced workers. We shall endeavor to have such questions answered carefully and wisely, and will hereafter devote a part of the space assigned to the young people's devotional topics to a consideration of the questions asked.

Questions upon the devotional topics themselves cannot be considered, because, after the lesson has appeared, any inquiry that reached us about it could not be answered before the lesson date had been passed. But questions as to how to do the various things that a young people's society is supposed to do, even questions of local or personal interest, will be welcomed. How can we make our young people more successful as soul-winners, of more real spiritual value to the church, and of real practical service to the church and community? You and your local society form part of a tremendous organization, with untold power for good. May we try to help you fill your place more efficiently? THE SEVEN CHURCHES OF ASIA

AS A MODERN TRAVELER VIEWS THEIR SITES TO-DAY

BY REV. FRANCIS E. CLARK, D.D., LL.D.

Founder and President of the Christian Endeavor Society

I T HAD long been my dream and hope that some time I might visit the sites of the Seven Churches of Asia, to which were addressed the letters by the Master through St. John the evelator, which, throughout all the centuries of e Christian Church, have held for its members so uch of rebuke and warning, and at the same time much of commendation and comfort.

It was not until the spring of 1912 that I was le to carry out my long-cherished design of visitg the sites of these seven historic cities. Even ıen it was considered a ɔmewhat foolhardy attempt y many of my friends, since urkey was at war with Itly, her harbors were mined nd in danger of bombardıent, and an outbreak of ıolera was threatened. Howver, the lions disappeared s they were faced, and we ɔund no serious difficulty, ıough some hardships and ıany inconveniences, in visːing Ephesus and Smyrna, 'ergamos and Thyatira, Sarːis and Philadelphia and ːaodicea. It is surprising ow few people attempt a isit to these cities of the ıpocalypse. Jerusalem numers its pilgrims by tens of housands. Bethlehem, Nazaeth, Damascus, have fewer, ut still a great company ach year. But the seven ities of Asia Minor, to vhich the Alpha and the)mega wrote wonderful mesages which were not for hem alone but for the hurches of all time, are selom visited, and still more eldom described. Libraries ɔf volumes have been writen about the holy places of Palestine, but the litːrature of the holy places of Asia Minor is scanty ndeed.

Ephesus, being but a short distance from the great port of Smyrna, is visited by many tourists, or at least many get as far as Ayasolouk, the railroad station two miles from the chief ruins of ancient Ephesus. Many of these tourists are satisfied with a hasty glimpse of the ruins of the Church of St. John, so called, the few scattered marbles that mark the site of the ancient temple of Diana, and a good dinner at the Ephesus Hotel, after which they return on a fast train to Smyrna and the steamer which brought them there, having accomplished their hasty mission to one of the Seven Churches in the space of some three hours. Even the missionaries and Christian workers who live in the country have seldom been permitted by their arduous duties to visit these sites of such intense interest to the Christian.

The Monastery Over the Grotto of St. John, where Tradition Says He Saw the Revelations

Such a journey now is altogether practicable, for the restrictions and annoyances that formerly attended travel in Turkey have been largely removed. The Turkish custom house has no longer any terror for the honest traveler. The officials are polite and are willing to give what information they possess. The meager railway service of Turkey has been extended of late years so that the traveler can go by rail to six of the Seven Cities, and he can travel with as much safety to life and limb, if not with as much comfort, as he can in America. On one line of railway, which is controlled by a British company, he can, by starting from Smyrna, visit Ephesus and Laodicea, and the no less interesting Hierapolis, which all lie to the south and east of Smyrna. By another line he can reach in a few hours Sardis and Philadelphia, which are almost directly east of Smyrna. Going north from Sardis, on a branch line, he comes to Thyatira. Northeast of Thyatira is Soma, the present terminus of this French line of railway. A six hours' journey from Soma, by araba or on horseback, brings him to Pergamos, where was "Satan's seat," the only one of the Seven Cities which is not directly on a railway line.

There are many by-products of such a journey which should not be forgotten, though not of chief interest to the Christian traveler. The scenery in which one finds himself in visiting the Seven Churches is grand and picturesque, almost beyond the power of expression. The traveler is never out of sight of lofty mountains. At some seasons of the year they are snow-capped, at other times cloud-capped, but always magnificently impressive. The curious serrated walls and battlements of the hills in the vicinity of Sardis and Philadelphia, worn by the gnawing tooth of time into a thousand fantastic shapes, are worth going far to see. At other times the traveler finds himself journeying up the peaceful valley of the serpentine Meander; or crossing, by stepping-stones, the waters of the fabulously rich Pactolus, where Crœsus found his gold; or looking down from the acropolis of Pergamos upon the beautiful green valley of the Caicus. He will see much that will interest him in the Turkish villages and larger towns, in the cosmopolitan population of the region with its many types of humanity and a vast variety of costume and custom. If he is not too squeamish he will enjoy, or at least be able to endure, the nights in a Turkish khan, or a Greek hotel, or the restaurant where no one has the fear of microbes before his eyes, and where the edict against the pestiferous fly has not gone forth.

How magnificently the message to the Seven Churches is prefaced! "Grace be unto you, and peace," says the Revelator, "from Him which is and which was and which is to come, and from the seven spirits which are before his throne, and from Jesus Christ, who is a faithful witness, and the first begotten of the dead, and Prince of the kings of the earth." Was ever a series of letters begun in such an exalted strain? The Alpha and the Omega, the Beginning and the End, the Lord who is and was and is to come, the Almighty One, told the Revelator what to write, what special messages to send to Ephesus and Smyrna, and Pergamos and Thyatira and Sardis and Philadelphia and Laodicea!

A pathetic interest is added to the preface to these letters in the personal and intimate word of greeting from John, the Master's scribe. "Your brother and companion in tribulation," as he calls himself, "and in the kingdom and patience of Christ." He had need of patience indeed, for in his old age he had come to a period of the severest Roman persecution, probably in the reign of Domitian, most cruel of persecutors. "His punishment took place," we are told, "at a time when the penalty for Christianity was already fixed at death in the severer form, that is, by fire or crucifixion, or as a public spectacle at games or festivals for persons of humbler profession or provincials, and simple execution for Roman citizens. . . . Banishment combined with hard labor for life was one of the grave penalties. Many Christians were punished in that way. It was a penalty for humbler criminals, provincials and slaves. It was in its worst forms a terrible fate. Like the death penalty, it was preceded by scourging, and was marked by perpetual fetters, scanty clothing, insufficient food, sleep on the bare ground in a dark prison, and work under the lash of military overseers. It is an unavoidable conclusion that this was St. John's punishment."—Sir William Ramsay.

As we think of this fate which would be so terrible for any one who was not "in the Spirit,' and who could not see the vision of the new heaven and the new earth, we find a new and tear-compelling pathos in the words "your companion in tribulation and in the kingdom and patience of Jesus Christ, who was in the isle that is called Patmos, for the word of God, and for the testimony of Jesus Christ."

Patmos is one of the group of islands called the Sporades. It is now called Patino, and lies twenty four miles distant from the coast of Asia Minor, a little south of Ephesus. It is a tiny little islet, compared with some of its larger neighbors, and has an area of only sixteen square miles, and at present a population of four thousand souls. In John's time there were still fewer inhabitants, yet before the days of recorded time the islands were inhabited, for cyclopean remains are found there, which show its prehistoric antiquity.

There are not many things of great interest in Patmos, except as the memory and the spirit of St. John suffuses every landscape with his gentle spirit of love. There is, however, the Cave of the Apocalypse, in which, tradition tells us, the apostle saw the vision which he has recorded in the last book of the New Testament. There is also the Monastery of St. John, founded eight hundred years ago, which once contained an important and valuable library, now removed to the Bodleian Library at Oxford. In this library was found one of the most valuable of the ancient manuscripts of the Gospels. It is not what St. John saw in Patmos that interests us, but what he saw far away, as he looked out from his island prison. Looking to the north and east he could, from the heights of Patmos, doubtless see the great mountains of Asia Minor to the north, among which lay the Seven Churches.

The scenery and situation of Patmos give us a key to much of the imagery of the Book of Revelation. Patmos was one of the islands of an archipelago. High mountainous headlands could be seen on every side, and around all, shutting him in from country and plain and fellow disciples, was the impassable sea, his real prison wall, mysterious and dangerous. As we think of this situation of the aged seer we can more fully understand his imagery when he tells us that every "mountain and island were moved out of their places," that every "island fled away and the mountains were not found." Everywhere throughout Revelation we read of the sea; the "things that are in the heaven and in the earth and in the sea"; "the mountains which shall be cast into the sea;" "the angel that stood with his right foot upon the sea;" "the sea of many waters," and at last, toward the end, the revelation that must have seemed so joyous to the sea-imprisoned saint—the revelation of the time when there shall be "no more sea."

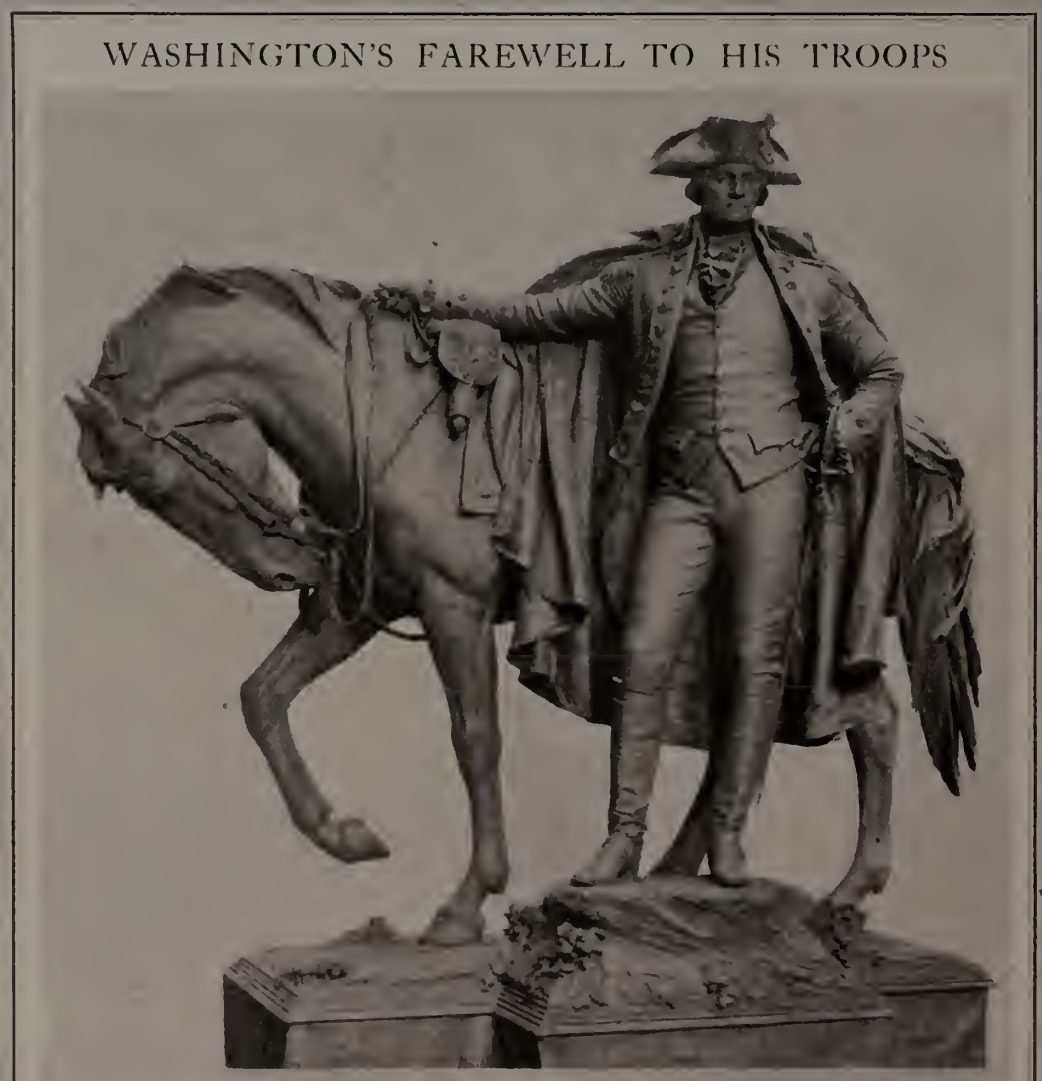
In writing the Apocalypse St. John adopted the common literary style of Jewish writers called the apocalyptic style. It was not exactly prophecy though allied to prophecy, and the letters to the Seven Churches were not epistles intended to be read to the churches, but to be read together with the rest of the Book of Revelation. The Seven Cities to which they were addressed stood as representatives of seven groups of churches, and yet as the Seven Churches were not of equal importance Smyrna, Ephesus and Pergamos were three of the great cities of St. John's time; three of the mighty capitals of the world. Philadelphia and Thyatira were humbler cities, cities of the second class we should call them. Sardis had had a magnificent history and perhaps even then might have been numbered with the three foremost cities already mentioned, though it had lost much of the glory and importance which belonged to it when it was the capital of Crœsus and of Cyrus the Great.

Laodicea lay at some distance from Ephesus, its nearest neighbor among the Seven, and though by no means equal to the great four, was an important center of trade and commerce, not far from two other large centers with which the Bible also makes us familiar, Hierapolis and Colossæ. The Seven Cities were evidently chosen not because they were all among the first cities of the world, but because they were representative cities.

It must not be forgotten also that there were other churches in the province of Asia besides the seven to which these letters were directed. This fact makes them all the more representative. Each church of the seven had its own individuality, but each was also a representative of other churches, and it may be said that the Seven epitomized all churches in all the ages: churches which were ardent and faithful; churches that had lost their early enthusiasm; churches that harbored heresy and unbelief; churches that temporized with the world; churches that did not rebuke sin in its grossest forms; and, on the other hand, churches that maintained the faith, kept their early zeal aglow, reprobated the wrong, stood steadfast unto the end, churches which should receive at last the crown of life. Such were the Seven Churches of Asia, and such are the seventy times seven thousand churches of today. In this universal quality lies the special interest of the churches of the Apocalypse to us of the twentieth century. As the great French preacher Bossuet said of the Book of Revelation, "All the beauties of Scripture are concentrated in this book, all that is most touching, most majestic in the law and in the prophets receives here a new splendor and passes again before our eyes that we may be filled with the consolations and the graces of all past ages."

In succeeding articles we will visit each of the Seven Cities, see them as they look to-day in their ruins, or inhabited with their twentieth century population; see their present characteristics, as we try to recall their ancient glories; look upon the mountains that tower above them, the streams that peacefully wend their way through them, and the unchanging yet ever-changing clouds and sky that bend above them; thus we humbly hope to make more vivid and real to our readers the messages to the "Seven Churches which were in Asia."

WASHINGTON'S FAREWELL TO HIS TROOPS



Copyright, 1910, by J. Massey Rhind, Sculptor

SINCE the anniversary of Washington's birthday was last celebrated there has been unveiled at Newark, New Jersey, a striking bronze of our national hero taking formal leave of his soldiers at Rocky Hill, near Princeton. The unveiling of the statue took place on the one hundred and twenty-ninth anniversary of the event it commemorates. Later, the great Revolutionary leader bade a tearful goodby to his officers at Fraunce's Tavern in New York City, but on the occasion that inspired this noble work of art he gave his last word to the rank and file of the Continental Army, and through them to all the people. The statue is the work of Mr. J. Massey Rhind, a talented New York sculptor, and was unveiled with great ceremony before representatives of all the colonial, Revolutionary and patriotic societies and a vast gathering of the general public. The following verses by Mr. Joseph F. Folsom appeared in the program of the ceremony:

Thus stood he by his charger when at last
He paused his troops to wish a fond farewell:
Then, homeward mounting, rode away to dwell
In peace, with all alarms of battle past.

Thus may he stand forever in our street,
Ready to mount and ride in our defense;
Or win us back with silent eloquence
To nobler tasks, and daily lives more sweet.

WHAT "TRUE CONVERSION" MEANS

A REMARKABLE SYMPOSIUM BY LEADING PASTORS ON A VITAL TOPIC OF THE CHRISTIAN LIFE

IN THE whole range of religious experience there is no question that is capable of such varied interpretation as that which relates to Conversion. To the unconverted and spiritually unawakened, it is a mystery—a transformation which the unenlightened mind does not seem able to grasp, a change in the thoughts, ambitions, purposes, acts and all that relates to the life and character of the individual. In order that our readers may have the benefit of the authoritative definition of "True Conversion" from the ablest ministers in the American pulpit to-day, we recently invited a number of pastors to give their interpretation for publication. The first instalment of these letters appears below, and will be read with general appreciation. They represent the views of pastors who are active in the Christian ministry—men of sound orthodoxy and large spiritual experience. While all agree on the essential facts, there is ample variety of opinion concerning details.

"Conversion a Touch at the Regulator," Writes Rev. A. H. C. Morse

Time is one of the great facts of the universe—a heavenly thing; and it is measured by the swing of the stars. My watch "goes wrong." The trouble is not so much with its hands as with its heart. Moreover, it will do no good to "set" its hands; for they will continue their shortcomings. To set the watch right, it must be touched at the heart, and set right with things as they are. After that I can set the hands right, and the little instrument will tick its way through day and night in time with the movements of heaven. And if the watch could think, it would be conscious of a noble fellowship. Which things are a parable. The trouble with man is not with his hands but with his heart; not with his conduct, but with his soul. He is wrong within, and conversion is a touch at the regulator. Moreover, it is a divine touch, whereby the whole bias of the soul is corrected. Conversion sets the heart right; and the contemporary experience of justification sets the conduct right; and behold, the man knows he is in fellowship with God and with his Son Jesus Christ. But how is this effected? Well, how is the watch fixed? I had confidence enough in the watchmaker to refer it to him. And he did the work. And the soul is set right in the same way. It is referred to its Maker by faith, and behold! all things become new.

REV. CHARLES A. EATON
New York City

But men have said to me that the scheme of saivation is arbitrary. It is vain, they say, to shut up the world to faith. But, so far as I can see, the entire universe is arbitrary. There is nothing more arbitrary than the laws of mathematics, or of health, or of gravitation. Is it not strange that every son of Adam is shut up to the multiplication table? If a man wants to compute numbers in China, he must use the identical system of numbers that we use here. Moreover, there is only one law for light, or heat, or electricity, or numbers, or gravitation in all the earth. But I cannot see that this is narrow, if it is always adequate. So there is only one way of salvation in all the earth; nor is this narrow, if it is always sufficient. There is only one way to fix a bad watch, and that is to set it right with a heavenly standard. That must be done at the regulator. There is only one way to fix a bad man, and that is to set him right with God and all heavenly things. This must be done at his heart. It is a wonderful experience. It is Christian conversion.

"Conversion the Most Wonderful Thing in the Realm of Life," Writes Rev Charles A. Eaton

True conversion is the most wonderful thing in the realm of life. The unconverted man is a link in the life series whose end is death. "Sin when it hath conceived bringeth forth death." To be a sinner is to be separated from God and centered in self; self is not the source of life. In conversion, the man changes his mind, or in one word repents of his sin. This involves a turning from sin. The next step is a turning to God as revealed in Jesus Christ our Saviour. This act of the will is called faith. Then comes the wonderful part which God reserves for himself. In response to true repentance and faith God plants in the sinful soul a new life. The man becomes at once a new creature in Christ. He is lifted out of the life series centered in self and ending in death and is transplanted into a new life series centered in God and ending in life eternal. Man alone of all living beings can be born twice. This Gospel is the rock foundation of Christianity. It gives to our religion its unique character and is the source of its deathless influence over men.

"Conversion Is Turning from the World to God, and Accepting the New Life," Writes Pastor R. W. Jungfer

Conversion is a change of thought and manner of acting. It is the faithful acceptance of the new life, wrought by God, therefore a turning from the world to God, or from the broad path to the narrow one.

Lutheran Church, Pittsburg, Pa. RICHARD W. JUNGFER.

"Conversion, Acceptance of Christ's Rule in the Heart," Writes Pastor Sheldon

Conversion is the joyful, enthusiastic, whole-souled acceptance of the rule of Jesus Christ in the heart of the human being. It is not only one experience marking some special turning point and change in habits of thought and conduct, but it is a life-long series of new and daily experiences all along the history of a soul's conflict for righteousness and Christlikeness. Conversion is the putting of Jesus into a daily life so that His standards of life become one's own. It is the clear knowledge on the part of a man that his sins are forgiven, that his temptations can be overcome, and that the eternal life is a clear and undisputed fact. Conversion is the fact of Jesus Christ ruling and loving in the very heart-spring of all the man does, says, or thinks; so that the old things have passed away and all things have become new. The converted man is a new man in Christ Jesus. This conversion may be a gradual growth as well as a sudden experience, but whether it is gradual or sudden it is all due to the true working of the Spirit of God upon the religious part of the life of a man. CHARLES M. SHELDON.

"Conversion Is Turning from Sin to Christ as Saviour," Writes Dr. Torrey

Conversion means "turning around." In its Christian application, a turning from sin and selfishness to Jesus Christ to accept him as Saviour and Lord and King. Regeneration is the impartation of a new nature—God's nature—to the one who is born again. Conversion is the outward thing; regeneration a deep, radical, thorough-going matter. One may be converted a hundred times; he can be regenerated only once. R. A. TORREY.

Los Angeles, Calif. (Evangelical).

"Conversion Means a New Life, a New Creature, a New Man," Writes Pastor Braunstein

Conversion means just what Jesus said to Nicodemus, when he came to Him pondering the mysteries of the kingdom. We can do no better than this earnest inquirer of old—go to the Master Teacher "come from God," and learn what he has to say about this great theme. He said to Nicodemus: "Ye must be born again." Conversion is a "new birth"; it is being "born again"; it is being "born from above" and "born anew." No matter how you express it, it means a new life, a new creature, a new man. It means beginning all over again. Would we see the kingdom of heaven? Then we must become as a little child, approaching God with a willingness to learn of him and to do. It means that we are to have a teachable spirit and a humble mind, approaching Christ through faith, listening to him, following him and recognizing him as the only approach to God, and be in harmony with his will and his purpose for us. It means that we pray earnestly for Holy Spirit guidance that these things may be so, for through the functions of the Spirit are these things possible.

REV. CHARLES H. PARKHURST
New York City

Conversion means that the back has been turned on sin and the life hereafter devoted to righteousness. It means a complete surrender of self and an attitude of "Thy will, not my will, be done." Conversion means loving God and one's neighbor.

Conversion means overcoming the world and having the love of God in our hearts, which makes people do things differently. The new birth makes the lazy man active, the drunken man sober, the vicious man kind, the weak man strong. It takes a passive faith and makes it throb with new energy and new duties. The new birth means that the will has been surrendered to God. The new life is an obedient, submissive, active, clean, useful life, walking close to Christ, step by step all the way. It is so living this life that the soul, when ready, shall be enabled to go forth out on the great adventure with God and at last enter the life abundant. RICHARD BRAUNSTEIN.

Pastor M. E. Church, Ashland, N. Y.

"Conversion Means Turning About and Going in the Right Direction," Writes Dr. Parkhurst

I have not a great deal of respect for definitions when applied to matters of religion. I recall only one proposition of the kind occurring in Scripture, and as to the interpretation to be given thereto perhaps no two commentators would be agreed. Conversion, as the word itself suggests, is a turning about and going in the opposite direction. If one has always been going in the right direction, as seems to have been the case with Samuel, no turning about is necessary. If you want a theological seminary definition you must go to a seminary graduate, which I am not. C. H. PARKHURST.

Madison Avenue Presbyterian Church, New York.

"A Complete Change of Intellect, Heart, Conscience and Will," Writes Dr. John Balcom Shaw

As to what conversion is, I beg to say that I fall back upon the etymological meaning of the word, namely, a change of mind; and I take the word "mind" in its inclusive sense as embracing all of a man's conscious and responsible being—his intellect, heart, conscience and will. So that when a man is converted his views of things, his feeling toward things, his judgments as to right and wrong, and his purposes are all changed. God seems different to him and he himself is a different being. JOHN BALCOM SHAW.

Second Presbyterian Church, Chicago.

"A Transformation of the Whole Attitude Toward God and Our Fellow Man," Writes Dr. C. P. Butler

Conversion is that "change of mind" in which a man begins to think in the terms of Christ. His whole attitude toward God and toward his brother undergoes transformation. The will of the Father begins to be his joy, and his prayer is "What wilt thou have me to do?" This change of motive is quickly evidenced in a turning about of the manner of his life.

First Presbyterian Church, Lakewood, N. J. COURTLANDT P. BUTLER.

"CHOOSE YE"

TEXT: "Choose you this day whom ye will serve."
Joshua 24: 15

A SERMON

By

Rev. Russell H. Conwell, D.D.*

IN a chapter in which blessings and cursings were set before the people of Israel, Moses said: "I call heaven and earth to record this day, with you or against you, that I have set before you blessing and cursing. Therefore choose life that thou and thy seed may live."

What a useful lesson this is, and how it applies to every person! Not one of you, young or old, this morning, that hath not a place in this teaching. One of the sublimest utterances of all the world, and so sublime was it in Moses' mouth that Joshua, who heard it, repeated the same idea at Shechem when he said: "Choose you this day whom ye will serve. As for me and my house, I will serve the Lord." Choose ye. Choose life that thou and thy seed may live. This great utterance was repeated in effect again by Elijah, when he went forty days and nights into the wilderness, in consequence of the nervous reaction from its sublimity. He for forty days saw no rain. He for forty days served the Lord with absolute devotion, and he chose to do it; and as Moses chose to be with the children of Israel rather than have all the pleasures of Egypt, so Elijah chose to be with the people of God; and as Jesus, in that touching inside view of the domestic circle that shines with such brilliancy back through the ages from Bethany, said to Martha, "Mary hath chosen the better part," so I say in the few minutes that I shall try to teach, "Choose ye." Neither the good nor wise would ever advise others to do what they know they cannot do. Choose ye. It shows that God knew that mankind would choose, and we know, if we know anything, that we have the power to choose. Man can choose to-day this or the other, choose right or wrong, choose to go this way or that. He has it within his power to be very free, and yet, in order to fasten this thought where I would have it begin, we need to consider that we are always limited in our free choice. God puts his limitations around us. Within a certain circle we can do as we choose; beyond that we have no power. I need to remind you of that. I was struck this week by the thought that a man's free will, liberty to choose, to do what he will, is, after all, so much more limited than mankind realizes.

Our Range of Choice

I was talking with one of the assistant station masters at Springfield, Mass., when I went up to my old home two summers ago. It was a very hot day, the thermometer at 104 in Springfield, and he came to me and advised me not to undertake the Fourth of July oration, which he saw I was advertised to deliver, and I said, "I feel that as I made an engagement, I ought to go." "No," he said, "you have free choice to go or come, but you are responsible to God for it, and your choice should be limited by good sense, or God may limit it for you." When I came back three days later to Springfield, I saw his obituary in the paper. He had been stricken down with the heat, and when I talked with him on Monday, he said he was going on a vacation to the White Mountains; he had engaged a place there for himself and friends, and he told me how long he was going to stay. He had intended to go, but God had said, "Thus far shalt thou go and no farther."

Oftentimes we have a wider choice than we think we have. There are a great many theories concerning this question of free will, but often we choose to do something, and are really doing that which is far beyond the reach of our intention. It was only the other day that a dear young lady, an acquaintance from her babyhood, wrote to me that she was going to New York to make a visit, and that she intended to stay about a week or ten days and then was going to return to her home in the West. She chose to go to New York. She met the young man to whom she is now engaged to be married, and writes to me this week she is now going to live in a suburb of New York. All was changed. Her choice was to go to New York; in God's plan it was far wider for life; an entirely new place, new acquaintances, new friends, new home, all changed. So whatever may be our free choice to choose this or to choose that, after all, we must not forget that, beyond a very little sphere, we are in the hands of God.

We are at liberty to tell the truth or to tell a lie, and yet there are limitations about telling the truth. There often are certain persons with truthful hearts, with pure motives, who would not for the world misrepresent anything, who tell something that afterwards proves to be wholly untrue, because they have been moved by false evidence, by some innocent mistake. Therefore, while God sees that they intended to tell the truth, he does for reasons of his own permit them to state what they believe to be the truth, but which on going further proves to be, after all, false. If you intend to tell a lie it is surely limited, always so.

God's Limitations

A man may choose to do good. He may be a man whose purpose is to do good. He may be filled with the hearty intention of blessing mankind, and yet may lack that intellectual power to determine what is wise, and may do far more harm than good by all his efforts to do right. He is given the right to choose, and he may choose like that man in western New York, who, having a mill, had invited a friend. The friend who visited there set about to learn how to put the water on the water wheel and how to guide the mill so as to grind the grist in safety. One day the friend went into the mill, while the owner was at dinner. All the grist was in the hopper, and he thought he would make use of the time. So he lifted the gate and let the water in upon the water wheel of the mill. But as it rushed down through the raceway it drowned three men at work in the raceway, who he did not know were there. His intention was to do good. Instead of that he destroyed the lives of three intimate friends of his own best friend. You cannot tell. He had the choice. He could lift that gate. He chose to do it. The choice to do it, the will to do it and the power to do it, and yet how unwise it was even if his ultimate purpose was to do good! We do not hold him responsible, his intention is recorded before God; and while we know it shows choice, it is limited choice. We should always remember that.

We may choose to do evil, determine to do evil, and yet God limits that choice. There was a company of men, young men, started as robbers from a town in Vermont, resolved that they would rob a house where a man was living alone, who had the reputation of having a great deal of money around the house, hidden in various places, and yet when driving over the mountains in the night, while he was there alone in his house, unprotected, and they had everything to protect themselves, firearms and jimmies and every contrivance for breaking in, a strap broke in the harness, and away went the horse, down the mountain side to the bridge, and threw them all into the rushing river below, and only one of the number was saved to live, and he in a wretched, crippled condition. They had made their plans. They had chosen to do evil, but God's limitations came in.

Our Kingly Birthright

But the choice he leaves to us here as being our kingly birthright is the spiritual choice, and in this choice of spiritual things we have a very much wider range. Poets have sung and orators have said that the mind has no limitation. There is no prison for the mind. "He that is chained and in dungeon dark, whose mind is free, is free indeed." The shackles of slavery cannot change the mind. I need not repeat it. I need not enforce that thought. You recognize it. There is a far wider range to the liberty of choice in the mind. You can think if you choose. You can now think, if you choose, on beauty as it may be illustrated in the light of the morning, or may be shown in the lips of the rose, or may he from this pink on the table here, and you can see beauty if you will. Your choice, free choice. Think on beautiful things now. Think of the beautiful face of a loving friend. Think on the glorious scenery that from mountain or by shore or river may be looked upon now. Think upon the beauty of decoration, the beauty of painting, or sculpture, or architecture; the beauty of motion, the grace and loveliness of life. Think on it. You can. It is within your choice, and though you may be surrounded by everything that is disagreeable, you may be in darkness or may be hard at work, and yet within you is the ability to choose and put your mind on things so at variance with them as even to forget them altogether. You can think of love if you will. You may hate and you may be hated, and you may be surrounded with every evidence of contumely and disgrace and shame, and yet you may think on love, and thinking upon it, may put your heart into it so completely as to defy the enemies who surround you and the hatred that has held you prisoner. Think. You can think on hope in the most hopeless state. The mind has its liberty. Or, on the contrary, you can think on evil and evil deeds. You can think of disease and sorrow. You can think on crime; you can think on passion with all its hateful effects, and you can think on murder, dream you are a murderer yourself, if you guard not your mind under such circumstances. Consequently in that mental range we have a wider range. Yet even there God has placed his limitations.

As Ye Choose, so Shall It Be

But in that text that Moses used, the exhortation he gave is the direction to choose God, as against all other gods, as against all other things, against worldliness, against selfishness, to choose God; and we have the power to choose him. There are so many graces connected with the choosing to give one's heart to God that they will serve as an introductory exposition of it. You can choose to be good-natured, and have the power to be so. You cannot deny that to yourself or you would make yourself out insane. Without that power you would have no mental or moral power over yourself. Now Moses said, "Choose God." That is, choose godly things, the Spirit of God. Give your soul and your heart into his keeping. Now that you can choose to do that is made clear by the homely fact that you can choose this morning to be good-natured. Make up your mind, "I will this day be good-natured for Christ's sake. No matter how perplexing or provoking things may be, I have a free choice. I choose to be good-natured." You have power to choose to be patient. You have an impatient disposition, but you can be patient under all the various provoking things of life to-day. That is within the power to choose. God places no limitations on that. No limitations on your power to be good. No limitation on your power to be patient. No limitations on your power to be forgiving. Some people often say, "Oh, I can forgive but cannot forget." You are coming to the Lord's table where Christ himself is to preside this morning with his spiritual presence, and he says unto you that "as ye forgive others I will forgive you." He does not put the responsibility upon men when they cannot do it. No man has any right to say he cannot do it. It is a confession of weakness, or even wickedness, and he ought to be ashamed to make it. I can forgive, you can forgive. God said so. Your feelings of love say so. Your own common sense teaches you that you can. You should come to the Lord's table choosing to forgive and forever let the account be settled and bear no hatred against your enemy any more.

You can make up your mind to be contented with such things as you have. Oh life, human life! How lovely it would be if we only enjoyed what we had and did not allow the things we don't have and never can have to come in and rob us of the peace which the things we really do have could readily give! Oh, to be content! Christ says it is in our power. Paul said, "I have learned in whatsoever state I am therewith to be content." It was in his power to be content. It is not so much the gift of God as it is our own choice if we are contented. It is the gift of God to make that contentment perfect, to make it permanent. When we give in our hearts and surrender all our souls to him, as we ought this morning to do, he will insure its permanence, but he will not choose for us. There is no limit to that choice. You can believe the Bible is true. You can believe

SOME one has said that the beauty of a pine bough is never seen till it has been studied against the luminous background of the sky. Among the trees the pine appears very dark—almost a black mass. But the individual sprays, seen as suggested, are exquisitely light and interfused with air. Thus has the Japanese painter, that student of the soul of the world, interpreted to us the spirit of the tree. He has looked at it from beneath, sitting under its branches with a reverent mind, and discovered that its spirit is not an earth spirit, but is related to the heavens.

We learn, sooner or later, that this is the way in which sorrow should be viewed—against a background of light. The background is God's love. Then things which appear dark to the earthward gaze will become luminous and transformed. Christ does not want us to try to bear life's sorrows without the cheering radiance of heavenly light and love.

THERE is a beautiful little allegory which further expresses this thought.

Once upon a time, through a strange country there rode some goodly knights, and their path lay by a deep wood where tangled briers grew very thick and strong, and tore the flesh of them that lost their way therein. And the leaves of the trees that grew in the wood were very dark and thick, so that no ray of light came through the branches to lighten the gloom and sadness.

And as they passed by that dark wood, one knight of those that rode, missing his comrades, wandered far away, and returned to them no more; and they, sorely grieving, rode on without him, mourning him as one who was dead.

Now, when they reached the fair castle toward which they had been journeying, they staid there many days; and one night, as they sat around the logs that burned in the great hall, there came the comrade they had lost, and greeted them. His clothes were ragged, like a beggar's, and many sad wounds were on his flesh, but upon his face there shone a great radiance of deep joy.

And they questioned him, asking him what had befallen him; and he told them how in the dark wood he had lost his way, and had wandered many days and nights, till, all torn and bleeding, he had laid him down to die.

THEN, when he was nigh unto death, lo! through the savage gloom there came to him a stately maiden, and took him by the hand and led him on through devious paths, unknown to any man, until upon the darkness of the wood there dawned a light such as the light of day was unto but as a little lamp unto the sun; and in that wondrous light our wayworn knight saw, as in a dream, a vision, and so glorious, so fair the vision seemed, that of his bleeding wounds he thought no more, but stood as one entranced, whose joy is deep as is the sea, whereof no man living can tell the depth.

And the vision faded, and the knight, kneeling on the ground, thanked the good providence that had led him into that sad wood, that he might see the vision which lay hid there.

And the name of the dark forest was Sorrow; but of the vision that the good knight saw therein we may not speak nor tell.

IT MIGHT be said that we can not speak nor tell of the vision in the dark forest of Sorrow. For to be understood, it must be experienced. Only those who have seen the wondrous light breaking in upon the darkness and glorifying the place can believe it all. There are many who, while walking through the dark forest of Sorrow, keep their gaze upon the earth. They do not look up for the light. As Whittier wrote:

> Alas for him who never sees
> The stars shine through his cypress-trees!

These are the ones who must truly be pitied. For into the dark wood where they walk they have seen no great light shining, and the trees are as cheerless as are the dark masses of the pine seen without the light of heaven illuminating and transforming them. But to those who look up, and who hold their trials against the light, the path is a blessed one and their sorrows are glorified.

THE ANSWER

On hearing the assertion that romance is dead

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

AH, Romance is dead," the maiden said,
As she braided her golden hair;
Yet her eyes were bright and her step was light,
And oh! she was very fair.
Then with hurrying feet she went to meet,
In the light of the sunset red,
A man with a love like heaven above;
Yet she said that Romance was dead.

"For Romance is dead," the mother said,
As she stitched on a tiny gown;
And she seemed to sigh as she wondered why,
And tried to suppress a frown.
Yet her baby's kiss she could not miss,
As she bent o'er a little bed;
And a baby's smile warmed her heart the while,
Yet she thought that Romance was dead.

"Can Romance be dead?" the small girl said,
As she closed her book with a sigh;
And she dreamed away through the summer day,
As the ladies and knights passed by.
Other children played, and most of them strayed
Down a little path that led To a foaming brook and a fairy nook;
So how could Romance be dead?

A lady strolled through a garden cold,
Where the blossoms were withered dry,
Where the snowy blast came fine and fast
'Neath a sad and leaden sky.
She was bent of limb and her eyes were dim,
Yet she lifted her silver head;
And she cried to her Lord, "I thank thee, God,
That Romance is never dead!"

SONG ETERNAL

GOD of the saints who followed Him
Until his pilgrimage was done;
God of the women, frail and slim,
Who sought within the tomb thy Son;
Father of all who loved and cared;
Lord of the faithful unenticed—
This was the cry of those who dared:
The world for Christ! The world for Christ!

God of the few who voiced the call
From sea to sea and land to land;
Master of those who, giving all,
But asked the guidance of thy hand;
Lord of the converts multiplied;
God of the martyrs sacrificed—
This was the shout of those who died:
The world for Christ! The world for Christ!

God of the years of long ago;
Father of ages yet to be;
King of the millions here below,
Who worship Him of Galilee—
This is the hope of those who pray;
This is the faith that has sufficed;
This is the song of earth to-day:
The world for Christ! The world for Christ!

Prayer in Great Crises

THERE have been very earnest prayers by participants in great crises in the world's history, which were heard by our heavenly Father, who in due time mercifully answered them, marking important achievements and far-reaching results in the earth's affairs. The prayer of Washington at Valley Forge was such a prayer. He offered it up in snow-bound midwinter, in the dark days of our Revolution, when the Continental Army was in sore straits for the necessaries of clothing and supplies. In the midst of their darkest troubles General Washington was discovered kneeling in the snow, imploring divine aid for victory for his impoverished army, which eventually was realized.

Moody, the evangelist, in the early part of his Gospel campaigns, was "doing well enough," he thought, in spiritual results, and in the numbers that were coming to the Saviour; but two consecrated women believed far greater results would ensue if he were fully sanctified by the Holy Spirit with great spiritual power. Both commenced to pray earnestly, and besought the throne, like the pilgrims of old who would not let go "until he blessed them." Moody was endowed with greater spiritual power, and ever after throngs of thousands in the Moody meetings were brought to Christ. The two women recognized the far-reaching results as an answer to their united prayers.

David Livingstone, the great explorer, during his labors in Africa, was missed one day by his companions and servants. Search was anxiously made for him in the wilderness. He was found kneeling in the attitude of prayer; but his spirit had fled, for God had "taken him," like Enoch. This was Livingstone's last prayer. God heard and answered it. While wild beasts roamed at will, and savage and barbarous tribes were everywhere in that country, yet through the providence of God, the prayerful Livingstone traveled and passed away unharmed by any of them. How careful he is of his own. "Not even a sparrow falls to the ground without his notice."

EVERYBODY'S WINDOW GARDEN

BY IDA D. BENNET

WINDOW and veranda boxes have become so established a feature of the modern dwelling that their planting and care is of interest to every one who owns so much as a window under which a box may be placed or a veranda or balcony which may be made homelike and pleasant by the addition of a box of blossoming plants. No one who is building a new home can afford to neglect the possibilities of this form of embellishment, and one is fortunate indeed in being able so to incorporate it into the structure of the house itself as to make it a symmetrical part of the whole. When it is necessary to add boxes to a house already completed, they should, as far as possible, be made to conform to the architecture of the house so as to seem as much as possible a part of it.

Window boxes should not exceed in length the casing of the window under which they are placed, and should not, for ordinary windows, be more than nine inches wide or high. The supports should be of a practical nature, sufficiently strong to support the box securely. The boxes should be as nearly water-tight as practicable, a zinc lining being desirable whenever possible, and the bottom of the box should be fitted with a plug for the escape of surplus water after a storm. The new patent window boxes with reservoirs are to be recommended where expense need not be too closely considered, but where these are impracticable the ordinary wooden boxes employed should be well constructed to hold water, for window and porch boxes dry out at an astonishing rate. Then, too, there is much objection to a window box which leaks water at every pore after watering, especially if placed under an upper window. The boxes should be painted to match the color of house or trimming, and to be as inconspicuous as possible; it is the contents, not the box, which we wish to have in evidence.

It is a good plan, where removable boxes are used, to start these early in the spring, and so have the plants in a flourishing and sightly condition when the boxes are ready to go into position. This, of course, is only possible where there is other available warm space for the work of starting the boxes into growth.

Beautiful effects can be realized by a succession of boxes which shall feature the season's calendar of flowers. Boxes filled with crocuses, tulips, or hyacinths may be placed in the cellar in late winter and be ready for blooming at the earliest date on which they can be transferred to the open air. These may be followed by boxes of spring flowers, such as the hepatica, bloodroot, English daisies, ferns, and the like, and these in turn give place to the cultivated flowers of the greenhouse or garden.

The best soil to use in a window box is a good, fibrous loam, well enriched with old, well rotted manure. This should be filled in to within an inch of the top, and after the plants are placed in position the soil should be left somewhat higher around the ends and sides than in the center in order that the water may more thoroughly penetrate the soil than would be the case were it allowed to run down the side of the box. Plants in the narrow confines of a box make a close mat of roots which water does not easily penetrate.

A Beautiful Veranda Box of Coleus, Candytuft and Trailing Vines

As there is scarcely a situation, unless under a porch, in which a window box cannot be placed without some desirable plant being found suited to it, so there is scarcely a plant of medium growth which will not do well in a box if properly cared for and abundantly supplied with water. If there is any really unfavorable position, it is one exposed to the direct rays of the noonday and afternoon sun. For such positions as these only such sun-loving plants as geraniums, coleus, crotons and the like should be undertaken, but in east and north windows one may undertake almost any combination of plants desired.

In selecting plants for the window boxes, one should avoid tall and rank-growing plants whose growth will obscure the windows, as plants should not extend more than a foot, at the most, above the sill of the window. Coleus, when grown in south windows, for which position it is well adapted, should be kept pinched back to a low, stocky growth. This is easily done by pinching out the tips of each branch, and the process much improves the color and texture of the foliage. Geraniums will bloom far more freely if not allowed to grow tall and straggly, and may be pinched back freely. Heliotropes, which grow rather rank in the open, do not present the same objection, as the growth is rather prostrate, or can be trained so, and the wealth of fragrant bloom makes them very desirable occupants of south and east window boxes. Any vine which has a tendency to trail is apt to prove satisfactory in a window-box; petunias, for instance, do admirably here, and when the l e, ruffled sorts are selected are very effective. y y are little affected by hot sun and drought, once y have become established, and, as frost has e effect on them, they may be depended on to r e the windows bright long after all other flowers e failed.

If one wishes merely to enjoy a mass of br t color at the window or porch edge, without g z to much expense for plants, there are any nun - of bright garden flowers which may be utilized will be every bit as lovely as the more expen plants from the florist. Scarlet white verbenas are especially happy lections for the purpose, or one may the scarlet verbena and the pure wl anterrhinum Queen of the North, a riety growing but a foot high in open ground and somewhat less boxes. There is a new strain of dwa growing anterrhinums which sho win much favor for boxes, as well for the garden; these come in exquis shades of cream and white tinted a suffused with pink, clear yellow and t like, with some strong red shades, a all fluted and ruffled into a beautif whole. The pure white candytuft Em press is another excellent material f the window box and may be used combination with any scarlet, pink lavender flower. Lavender ageratum combine artistically with the pink geraniums, verbenas, or petunias, an may be used to advantage with som scarlets. Blue lobelias are charming i any situation calling for blue flowers.

In north windows almost any variet of ferns, palms, asparagus, begonia and like plants may be successfull grown; indeed the north boxes ar quite sure to be the most attractiv about the house. Trailing begonias during their short season of summe bloom, and the trailing abutilon ar both charming, and give the needed note of color. The ornamental-leaved begonias may be utilized for color, and asparagus sprengeri is really indispensable, making a complete and attractive box of itself. Fancy-leaved caladiums, tuberoses, begonias and gloxinias may all be successfully grown in east window boxes.

Vines are essential to a successful window box, and upon their selection much of the success of the planting will depend. Trailing vines are always to be preferred, as they will droop from the boxes, rather than twine and climb about the plants. Unfortunately this class of vines or trailers is not as large as one might wish, but there are a few good examples, chief of which is the well-known and popular vinca with its ovate, cream and green leaves. If this is used, the tips of the vine should be nipped in at the start to induce branching, as, treated in this way, one vine will give the foliage of half a dozen unpruned vines. This shortening back may be repeated at intervals with advantage. The glechoma is another valuable vine for the window box, and Kenilworth ivy is always available. Ivy-leaved geraniums are one of the best of trailing plants which may be used in place of vines. Where one is willing to give the necessary attention to keep the vines in position below the top of the box, there are any number of desirable vines which may be utilized.

TOPICS OF INTEREST AT HOME AND ABROAD

—JOSEPH P. TUMULTY, of Jersey City, who has been acting as secretary for Governor Wilson from the time he assumed office, is to be secretary to the new President, who made public announcement of his choice on February 3. Mr. Tumulty is thirty-three years of age, and was a member of the New Jersey Legislature. He is a lawyer by profession, and a member of the Roman Catholic Church.

—THE UNITED STATES SENATE has passed the resolution of Senator Works for a single six-year term for future Presidents by a vote of 47 to 23, and it now goes to the House. Under the resolution, no person who has ever held the Presidential office is to be eligible for re-election. The result of the Senate vote was a surprise, as it was not expected that a two-thirds majority could be mustered for the measure. An amendment by Senator Hitchcock, which would have exempted past Presidents and made the new provision take effect March 4, 1917, was voted down by 42 to 27, and an amendment to exempt the President now in office was also defeated by 38 to 29.

—MENELIK, KING OF ABYSSINIA, whose death is announced in the cable despatches, was a remarkable character. Claiming direct descent from the Queen of Sheba, he has ruled as Negus Negusti (King of Kings) since 1899. He was born in 1844, being a son of the king of Shoa, a petty monarch. He was captured in his boyhood by the governor of Kondar, who had usurped the Abyssinian throne under the title of Theodorus III. Menelik became a warrior with a great following, and took the field against Theodorus and his successor Emperor Johannes, and when the latter was slain in battle, Menelik was acclaimed as sovereign. He was a progressive ruler, and made commercial treaties with several countries, the United States included. He did much to introduce Western civilization into his country. He abolished feudal laws, freed the slaves, introduced an educational system and lifted his people out of comparative ignorance and barbarism. His successor, Prince Lidj Yasu, aged 17, is the son of a native prince, and has had a European education. He has been trained by Menelik himself and will carry out the general policies of that ruler.

—A RECENT CABLE despatch from Geneva states that there is a widespread belief in Switzerland that war between France and Germany is inevitable. On her French and German frontiers Switzerland has seen the gradual concentration of large forces of soldiers during the last two months. The frontier forts, especially Belfort, and those opposite from Mulhouse to Istein are on a war footing. Since the beginning of the year the Swiss federal authorities have begun to take precautions. All papers have published officially an article stating that "In the event of war" the Swiss in Europe must return to the army at once; while in the second zone of countries, including America and other continents where the Swiss are liable to military service, they must hold themselves in readiness to return. There will be no mobilization in Switzerland, because 100,000 men can be at their posts in twenty-four hours, 250,000 men in forty-eight hours, and 500,000 within a week. The Swiss army can give its great and powerful neighbors twenty-four hours' start, and still be ready before them. This is the first time since 1870 that the Swiss Government has taken matters so seriously.

—THE MYSTERIES OF THE workings and counter-workings of our government departments and of our courts of justice were well illustrated when a few days ago a writ of habeas corpus was granted for Cipriano Castro, the exiled ex-president of Venezuela, who had been detained at Ellis Island. In return for the insults he had offered our government during his rule as tyrant of Venezuela, the highest authority of the Immigration Department denied him entrance to our country, even as a visitor. This decision was hardly made public before the habeas corpus writ liberated Castro for twelve days. During this time he saw New York and made a visit to Albany. Here he was entertained at luncheon by Governor Sulzer.

OUR RELIEF WORK IN THE BALKANS

Mr. Atanasoff, of the Relief Committee

IN HIS most recent letters from the field of active relief work, Pastor Furnajieff gives the business acknowledgment of the last remittances and tells us of the progress of his work. Among the desolated villages and scattered farms that have been laid waste THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Relief Committee is still pushing its work of mercy as rapidly and as effectively as the funds will permit. As this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD goes to the presses, the artillery is again thundering at Scutari and Adrianople. Before the mails can carry it to our readers it is more than likely that either by capture or surrender Adrianople, with its starving thousands, will be opened for relief. This will mean that immediate relief measures must be undertaken there. Pastor Furnajieff's last letter follows:

"The chairman of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Relief Committee received the other day a letter from seven women, who have learned that there is a fund from a Christian paper to help non-combatants who are directly affected by the present war. The letter speaks for itself and is as follows:

"'To the Pastor of the Bulgarian Evangelical Church, Sofia.

"'MR. PASTOR: We read in the Zornitza about the fund from America to help the sufferers from the war, and decided to ask assistance. Please send aid through Rev. Anastas P. Meshkoff, Evangelical pastor of Gabrovo, that we may be able to get a sack of flour and some garb for our children, as each one of us has two or three children. When the general mobilization was declared, our husbands went under the flag with the army; and, being day laborers, they used to earn just enough to support their families. And now there is nobody to care for us. Neither the town nor private individuals nor the orthodox priest can do anything to relieve our condition. So we turn to you, pleading for help. We believe that your noble Christian heart is sympathetic and merciful; that is why we appeal to you for assistance.

"'We remain in expectation of your reply. (Signed) Mrs. Velika M. Yovcheva, Mrs. Stanka V. Deneva, Mrs. Tota I. Yovcheva, Mrs. Tota Dimo Kuneva, Mrs. Neda J. Mermerova, Mrs. Rada K. Laleva, Mrs. Nova Mahla.

"'Gabrovo.

"'P. S. In such straitened circumstances as ours, it is easy to discover the true friends and the true Christians.'

Two of the Orphans of the War

"I have written to the pastor referred to, asking him to investigate whether conditions are as described in the letter. Our pastors all over the country are the best helpers for this kind of work, and the English friends who come over to distribute have absolute confidence in their judgment.

"From Philippopolis, the pastor, Mr. Tsakoff, writes, saying: 'The other day the mother of four children died of starvation. That was in the new quarter of the city. Sufferings and hunger are spreading at a frightful rate, and that among people who are not at all inclined to beg. I do hope and pray that you put some more means in our hands to save people from fearful sufferings.'

"THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is doing a noble work. Our Christmas and New Year passed just a week ago, as we are under the old style calendar, and we are glad to say that many poor and destitute people lifted up to God grateful hearts and thanks for the kind help of Christian friends."

SNOWSLIDES IN THE CASCADES

RAILROAD men have experienced many difficulties this season on the Great Northern Line in the Cascade Mountain region in Washington. Several serious accidents have occurred, attended with loss of life. Owing to heavy rains and snowstorms, slides and avalanches have swept down the sides of the mountains, hurling boulders and masses of débris before them, covering the tracks in some places with great piles of earth and stone, and in others completely tearing them away in the impetuous rush. One of the worst avalanches in years thundered down the steep declivity near Laconia, wrecking a Milwaukee snowplow and instantly killing one of the laborers. A big force of shovelers were riding back of the engine when the great mass came rushing down and these were almost smothered to death by the gas fumes from the locomotive, which were diverted into the cab when the snow filled up the smokestack.

Digging Out the Right of Way and Railway Buildings at Ellensburg, Wash.

A very heavy snow, which gradually turned to rain, was the direct cause of the avalanche. The sodden, heavy, rain-soaked mass started the trouble at the top of the ascent, and down came the mighty bulk, gaining momentum, and bringing with it trees and rocks and gouging out a large section of the track. The roar of the avalanche could be heard at a distance of several miles. The snowplow and the big mallet with cab and box were buried to a depth of over ten feet. After a desperate struggle, the unfortunate men who were caught in the wreck succeeded in digging their way out and getting down the track to a watchman's cabin, but they were in a pitiable state of exhaustion. The body of the man killed was afterward found in the wreckage of the snowplow.

All the Milwaukee trains had to be diverted to the Northern Pacific route, going over the Cascades.

There was another huge slide at Windy Point, not far from Leavenworth, and a little to the west of the big tunnel. An engine and several coaches were completely buried. Fortunately, the dining-coach and two sleeping-cars escaped the slide; they were run under a snowshed for protection. It was a heavy rain that caused this disaster. Between here and the Cascade fully a dozen smaller slides took place, ranging from two hundred to four hundred feet in length and from ten to twenty feet in depth. Those that gave the railroad people most trouble were on the west slope of the mountain between Tye and Scenic, where there were packs of snow fifty to sixty feet deep.

The mountain division of the Northern Pacific was also in much danger, as the exceptionally heavy rains swelled the mountain streams and threatened to dislodge the dirt from the steep declivities. There has been a large precipitation of rain since the first of the year between Seattle and Tacoma and much of the farm lands are lying under water.

What Is Conversion?

WHAT is conversion?

It would be difficult to find a more important question than that. What is the change by which a man passes from a child of nature to a child of God, from an heir of death to an heir of endless life?

A number of leading clergymen have consented to send their personal answers to this question, and the first group of these answers appears in the present issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. While there are minor divergences of opinion there is agreement on the fundamental facts. All religious leaders agree that in the change by which a soul passes from death to life there is a part for man to do and a part which only God can do. Some teachers confine the word "conversion" to the part that man does, his "turning" toward God. Others make it include the whole work of regeneration, God's part as well as man's. As to the necessity for the change and concerning its essential characteristics all are agreed.

In an orchestra different instruments play different parts, but all are playing the same tune. An untrained onlooker, passing from one music stand to another, would think nothing but confusion could result. Some scores are simple; others difficult. According to the printed marks the violin is playing in one key, the piccolo in another, the trombone in another. Yet, as a matter of fact, each is playing in the same key; the harmony is perfect; and all are united in interpreting the same theme. It is often so of religious opinions; they seem to differ, but in reality all are interpreting the same essential truth. The symposium begun in this week's issue is a symphony on that earnest and eternal word of Christ, "Ye must be born again."

After all, the real question that this discussion should bring to the mind of every one who reads it is the one supreme question: "Have I yet found this priceless gift of eternal life?" We find again that the deepest thoughts and feelings of life have often been expressed in the simple words of the simplest of the old-time songs. And our minds slip back to the old Gospel hymn:

Lord, I care not for riches,
Neither silver nor gold.
I would make sure of heaven;
I would enter the fold.
In the book of thy Kingdom,
On its pages so fair,
Tell me, Jesus, my Saviour,
Is my name written there?

Arson as a Business

RECENT disclosures in New York and Chicago revealing the fact that arson is conducted as a business in these cities, and that there has been a very considerable percentage of fires during the past year, traceable to this criminal system, seem to have produced an impression on the fire insurance companies precisely the reverse of what was to have been expected. Recently, one of the paid firebugs in New York, who made a lucrative vocation of incendiarism, testified that there were other experts in the same nefarious business who worked at so much per "job." Some of these fires caused the loss of human lives. So numerous have been the cases of suspicious fires in certain quarters of the metropolis that it is now well understood that certain insurance companies absolutely refuse to take risks in those particular sections.

How lightly this whole criminal business is regarded by some of the fire insurance companies' officials may be gathered from the testimony given before the Illinois Insurance Commission recently. The president of a Connecticut fire insurance company testified that "reduction of the fire waste would not be a profitable thing." He added that "as a business, fire insurance is conducted with most satisfaction and with larger profits in years when fires are plentiful. A good number of fires means a good premium account." He evidently regarded fires as a capital advertisement to bring in new customers. Similarly, the manager of a foreign insurance company doing business here, testified before the same Commission that "if there were no fires there would be no insurance business," and he laid it down apparently as a sound business axiom that "the greater the fire damage, the greater the turnover out of which insurance companies make a profit." As though this were not sufficiently explicit, he proceeded with amazing deliberation to say: "We cannot make profits for our shareholders without fires; and therefore within certain well-defined limits we welcome fires!" It would be difficult to imagine a more cold-blooded invitation to crime than this. It shows a low state of business morals, to say nothing worse. If the fire insurance business is to be regarded as encouraging arson as a means of intimidating people and thus making new customers, it needs a thorough shaking up.

We believe, however, that cases of the sort we have quoted are exceptional, and that the great body of our insurance officials is made up of men of sound business ideas, who have no sympathy whatever with views of the lawless character indicated above. There are good men and bad in the insurance business, as in every other.

An Income Tax in Sight

THIRTY-SIX States have now ratified the income tax amendment to the constitution, the latest additions to the list being the States of Wyoming and Delaware. It is expected that New Jersey and New Mexico will shortly join the list, and Florida may do so a few months hence, when the legislature convenes. Thus far only four States have definitely rejected the constitutional amendment, viz., Connecticut, Rhode Island, New Hampshire and Utah. It was ratified by New York in 1911. This new tax, which will probably be enacted as a law at the coming extra session of Congress, is expected to raise a revenue of $100,000,000 annually, which will be sufficient to offset the loss of revenue from the reduction of customs duties. Representative Hull of Tennessee has already drafted the measure for presentation in Congress. While any announcement now of the terms of the proposed legislation would be premature, it is probable that the graduated income tax which the Ways and Means Committee has in view will provide for the payment to the Federal Government of one per cent. of all net incomes above $5,000 per annum. The bill has been drafted to conform to the recent decision of the Supreme Court in the corporation tax case, which held that a tax on business was constitutional. Small incomes below the $5,000 mark will be exempt, and there is a likelihood that there may be a ratio of increase in dealing with the larger incomes, thus permitting the burden to rest upon those who are best able to bear it. Whether the enactment of the new law will put an end to the high protective tariff remains to be seen. It will, however, give the government a leverage which will enable it, by a fractional change in the income tax, to meet any financial deficit in the future, and will do away with the necessity of tariff increase for that purpose.

Dr. Clark's Letters of Travel

DR. FRANCIS E. CLARK, founder and president of the Society of Christian Endeavor and one of the most observant of travelers, delighted our readers last year with his wonderfully vivid and instructive series of letters dealing with his travels "In the Footsteps of St. Paul." Never before were the journeyings of the world's first missionary so clearly and interestingly set forth. These letters, which appeared exclusively in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, were the next best thing to a personal tour in those ancient lands, and indeed even better, in the sense that they recalled, through the eloquent pen of this distinguished Bible scholar, the scenes and incidents connected with the foundation of the early Christian Church, filling up the gaps in the New Testament narrative with luminous explanations, the result of deep research and authoritative familiarity with the subject.

In this issue we publish the introductory article of an even more remarkable series of letters of travel by the same brilliant author. In those "Seven Cities of Asia," where the early Christian churches were founded, Dr. Clark has chosen a theme that is dear to the heart of every reader of the old Bible. Each of those cities was the subject of a special message, which may be found in the second and third chapters of the Book of Revelation. These deeply spiritual messages of which John was the inspired bearer give the clue to their character and condition in that early date. From those cities the Gospel has radiated in all directions throughout the world. Dr. Clark's articles will appear at short intervals during the next few months, and should be read by all who are interested in the early history of the faith of the "Seven Cities of Asia."

About the Bible Class

SO MANY inquiries have come in about the work of the Bible Question Class that we are taking this opportunity of answering them all at once.

It is not necessary to enroll in any formal way as a member of the class. Just send in your answers with your name and address. It is necessary to have your full name, rather than initials or a name like "Student," or "Reader." We must keep our records accurate; and some one else from your town might have the same initials or use the same pen-name.

There is no objection to two or more students working together, but when this is the case it should be stated clearly, so that no one will get credit for work done by another. We had last year some families working together; sometimes a mother and daughter, etc.

The class is for CHRISTIAN HERALD subscribers and their friends. Any one may enter at any time. Don't hesitate to come in later if you do not send answers to the first one or two lists. The lady who won first prize for 1912 did not begin till March. But start at once if you can.

The chief requirement is promptness. Answers should reach the office within two weeks after the questions appear. This is the only way we can keep abreast of the work, and answers received later than this cannot be counted. An exception to this rule will be made with the January questions for the benefit of those who were uncertain about the class requirements. Answers to List No. 1 will be received up to February 25.

It is perfectly permissible to use concordance and all other Bible helps.

Awards will be made on the same basis as in 1912: First awards to those sending perfect lists of answers the greatest number of times; second, to those sending perfect lists the next greatest number of times; third, to those sending perfect lists the third greatest number of times.

There will be a list of ten questions each month.

Lincoln Memorial at Washington

THE architect L'Enfant was employed by George Washington and Thomas Jefferson to prepare plans for the new national capital to be built. L'Enfant's plans were generally carried out, resulting in one of the most beautiful cities of the world. The Association of Architects and the city and national authorities recently set themselves to finish some of the original plans not completed in the construction of parks, memorial buildings, etc. In accordance with their suggestion and efforts the proposition of a memorial to Lincoln was agreed upon. In 1911 Congress passed an act authorizing an appropriation of $2,000,000 for a Lincoln Memorial to be placed in the District of Columbia, and created a Lincoln Memorial Commission, which was to avail itself of the advice of the Permanent Fine Arts Commission. On December 13, 1912, the Senate passed the bill approving the findings of the Lincoln Memorial Commission, appropriating $2,000,000 for a Lincoln Memorial in Washington. On January 29, 1913, the House approved the Senate bill. The measure was passed without any amendment after the body had debated the question for hours, during which several propositions were submitted as substitutes and were ruled out on points of order. The most serious rival proposition was that of Representative Borland of Missouri to build a national highway between Washington and Gettysburg. The plans of the Fine Arts Commission adopted by Congress call for the erection of a monument on the bank of the Potomac on the line of the axis running from the dome of the Capitol through the Washington Monument, nearly a mile from the Monument, and also in line with the home of Robert E. Lee on the opposite side of the Potomac. The monument is to be housed in an exquisitely beautiful Greek temple. Lincoln needs no memorial. By his greatness of intellect, warmth of affection, incorruptible integrity, heroic service to and sacrifice for his country, he built a monument more durable than any of marble or brass, on every acre of ground South as well as North, and fashioned an image cherished in the inner temple of the hearts of millions of citizens of the republic. It is strange that the nation should have waited a generation before building some such memorial at its capital. It is a tribute to the goodness and greatness of Lincoln as well as to the universal patriotism of our people that the memorial should have been authorized by the action of the party most of whom were opposed to his administration when he lived. The leader of God's chosen people built a stone monument to the nation's liberty secured by divine instrumentality, which is thus referred to:

This shall be a sign among you, that when your children ask their fathers in time to come, saying, What mean ye by these stones? then ye shall answer them, that the waters of Jordan were cut off before the ark of the covenant of the Lord. (Joshua 4: 6, 7.)

The Design for the Eastern Front of the Lincoln Memorial

Kites in Sea Wrecks

THE use of kites to carry a line to the shore for the transfer of passengers of steamships stranded as was the Uranium recently at Halifax was advocated by Thomas A. Edison the other day, and the world-famed inventor insisted that a law should be passed by Congress at once compelling vessels to carry such kites. "When a ship is driven on shore the wind is naturally blowing from the sea toward the land. The line attached to the kite could be played out a certain distance and then a hawser fastened to it which would be carried to land and the transfer of the passengers to safety thereby made possible. In the same way a hawser could be carried by kites from a rescue ship to the stranded ship and efforts to get her off the rocks or sand bar would be thereby facilitated." It is a beautiful thing for a man whose inventions have contributed so much to the convenience, comfort and efficiency of the world, to use his genius in directing attention to and demanding new devices for the saving of precious lives. Civilization has its perils and its awful sacrifice of human life. That sacrifice must be reduced by every device and precaution to the lowest possible degree. How important it is to use every instrumentality, human and divine, to save men from moral evil and ruin to lives of spiritual beauty and health, in imitation of the Master!

For the Son of man is not come to destroy men's lives, but to save them. (Luke 9: 56.)

Tragedy of Defective Rope

VERY many lives have been lost in the Alps and other mountain ranges by the breaking of defective ropes. The tragedy of Abbé Chiffet and his two guides in the Alps set ablaze the fires of indignation. They were climbing the eastern slopes of Les Courtes when the defective rope that should have held them, parted and let them down to an awful death. The Alpine Club took up the subject of the insecure ropes and has effected quite a reform in the quality of the material out of which they are composed and the manner in which they are made. The ropes that pass the inspection of the Alpine Club and are guaranteed to hold are marked by a crimson thread wrought into them. In climbing spiritual altitudes, the rope that is safe for the soul is the one that has the scarlet thread woven into it, the stain of the Spotless Victim. The salvation of the soul is suggested by the cable fastened to the anchor that holds in the storm:

Which hope we have as an anchor of the soul, both sure and steadfast, and which entereth into that within the veil. (Heb. 6: 19.)

Money Earned During Vacation

STUDENTS in Columbia University earned nearly $40,000 during the last summer vacation. Fifteen girls from Barnard College reported that they had earned $1,500 by extra tasks during the same time. The facts and figures were given out by the University Committee on Employment for Students. One thousand two hundred jobs were secured, half of them by the committee. Some worked in mills, some were clerks in stores, some ran automobiles, others got more lucrative jobs in banks, in the city departments, and even in filling pulpits as supplies. Ability, perseverance and energy have an ever-increasing market value, and the man who possesses these qualities and has some knowledge of his work, is tidy in his appearance, and especially has a good character, will not have much difficulty in finding some employment, so the Committee at Columbia says. In nearly all the colleges of the country there are a number of students who work their way through, becoming frequently the best scholars, and the most successful persons in after life. In the spiritual world the same law of personal labor obtains, and hence the injunction:

Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling. (Phil. 2: 12.)

Mystic Crystal Sphere

THE Museum of Natural History in New York has acquired a "mystic crystal sphere," a silver-mounted globe of quartz pure in quality and of wonderful beauty. For centuries this sphere has been regarded with veneration and even fear by the people of the Far East. Unknown powers of magic were claimed to lurk within its limpid depths, and this has been employed by wizard and fortune-teller with no little profit in days gone by. Oh, what a world of strange things it could tell! What a succession of wonderful secrets it could reveal if it only had a tongue! Fabulous stories have been told of the size and mystery of these quartz utensils. Mohammed Ben Mansur alludes to a merchant of Mauritania having a basin made of two pieces of crystal so large that four men could sit upon it at once, and says it possessed the gift of prophecy. Probably the most expert crystal fashioners were the Japanese and Chinese of a thousand years ago. They had no labor-saving devices, but skill, patience and hereditary pride made up for their lack of mechanical tools. The masses, at first rounded into globular form by chipping with small hammers, were afterward ground down to an even surface with powdered garnet or emery. The last polish was imparted by rubbing the surface with bamboo and with the hand, which had been dipped in a kind of rouge. The great value of these large spheres arises from the rarity of the quartz masses of a desirable quality for their creation. The islands of Nippon and Hondo yield a very superior grade of material, the fragments being uncovered in the gravel beds of ancient streams. The sphere of mystery which for centuries multitudes of the inhabitants of the Far East claim has told their fortunes, solved their problems and blessed their fields and homes and hearts will be viewed with keen interest by visitors to the Museum of Natural History. The mystic sphere that solves problems and foretells the future is God's revealed Word, whose prophetic book reveals the mysteries of the Eternal, in which the author saw a firmament over the heads of the creatures, a perfect sky in which the divine glory appeared upon the throne likened to a terrible crystal.

And the likeness of the firmament upon the heads of the living creature was as the color of the terrible crystal, stretched forth over their heads above. (Ezek. 1: 22.)

St. Paul's Cathedral Settling

ALARMS in recent years regarding the rumored instability of St. Paul's Cathedral in London have been reawakened by the official report which Sir Francis Fox, consulting engineer in Westminster and the city of London, has just presented after having made careful examinations. His report is that the cathedral is overloaded; that it is actually moving and cracking. The investigation was made when the city council of London planned to construct a new subway near the east end of the structure. The foundations of the cathedral are on wet sand, gravel and peat, and a greater weight was put in the structure than they could safely support. The vibration of the motor busses has done some of the injury. Foundations are everything, especially in character. The Rock of Ages is the only safe foundation for the Christian. As to the foundation and structure the apostle said:

Let every man take heed how he buildeth thereupon. (I Cor. 3: 10.)

THE WAY OF THE COVENANT*

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

THE Hebrew word for "covenant" means a cutting, and comes from the custom among the Hebrews of cutting an animal in two, and walking between the parts as the ceremony connected with making a covenant. So when God would make a covenant with Abram, he graciously entered into the way known to men, and said to him: "Take me an heifer of three years old, and a she goat of three years old, and a ram of three years old, and a turtle dove and a young pigeon" (Gen. 15: 9, 10). Abram procured these, and divided them in the midst, laying the halves in two opposite piles, only he put the whole dove on one side and the whole pigeon on the other, according to the law afterward given to the Israelites that turtle doves or young pigeons offered for sacrifice should not be divided asunder (Lev. 1: 14-17). And as God had come to the Garden in the cool of the day to hold communion with Adam and Eve, so when the sun was gone down God came to Abram, and his glory was as fire that passed between the two sides of the cuttings; then the whole became a smoking furnace, as when God accepted the sacrifice prepared by Elijah on Mount Carmel. The covenant thus sealed was that the whole land should belong to Abram and his children from the River of Egypt, the Nile, to the River Euphrates, and from the Red Sea northward along the border of the Mediterranean Sea. Roughly estimated, it might be said to cover an area of 900x500 miles. Like a vestibule opening into a great cathedral had been God's promise to Abram shortly before the sealing of the covenant that his children should be as numerous as the stars. "Look now toward heaven and number the stars; and if thou be able to number them, so shall thy seed [thy children] be" (Gen. 15: 5). Unless Abram was given supernatural power to count the stars, he saw very few compared with those numbered by astronomers equipped with modern telescopes. The best that even they can say is, "The total number must be counted by hundreds of millions." One astronomer has dared to place the number at 1,650,000,000. Great as it was, Abram took God at his word, and it was counted to him for righteousness (Gen. 15: 6). And again this promise was repeated (Gen. 17: 1-16) and a change was made in his name from Abram, meaning "exalted father," to Abraham, "the father of a multitude."

God's covenant with Abraham included eight promises, and we find them arranged in a table in Peloubet's Notes, as follows: first promise, Gen. 12: 1-3; second promise, Gen. 12: 7; third promise, Gen. 13: 14-17; fourth promise, Gen. 15, 1, 5, 6, 18; fifth promise, Gen. 17: 1-10, 19; sixth promise, Gen. 18: 18, 19; seventh promise, Gen. 21: 12; eighth promise, Gen. 22: 16-18.

Abraham was surrounded by powerful peoples, under strong kings or rulers, who were a constant menace to him. He had no warriors to fight for him, only his servants, three hundred and more, who were mostly shepherds and herdsmen. But they were certainly a brave lot of men, judging from the valiant service they rendered when Abraham took them to deliver Lot from the captivity of the four kings who had despoiled Sodom and other cities of the plain (Gen. 14).

How could it be that a "horror of great darkness" should be experienced by Abraham (Gen. 15: 12)? Elijah had a similar experience after his conflict with the priests of Baal on Mount Carmel. God sent an angel to comfort and strengthen Elijah (I Kings 19: 1-8), but God came himself to hearten Abraham; then it was that God entered into the covenant with him by passing between the pieces laid in order by the command of God. It was "the blood covenant," so called by Orientals, and by it was expressed "blood brotherhood," which meant that the two parties entering into it sustained to each other a relation which superseded every other tie. The "blood brother" was pledged to do whatever he was asked to do. This will explain why Abraham was so ready to offer up his only son when God made the demand (Gen. 22: 1-8). God did "prove" Abraham and did not "tempt" him as we read in the King James Version. When Stanley went to Africa to search for the great missionary, David Livingstone, he found that his safety was insured and his plans helped by entering into the blood covenant with kings through whose domains he was obliged to travel. The "cutting" was, however, quite different from that followed in Abraham's time, for Stanley and the kings made slight incisions in their veins, usually in the arm, and one was laid over the other, so that the blood was mingled. A distinguished lady traveler, Mrs. Mary French Sheldon, had a similar experience. She went nine hundred miles into the country of the Zambezi in Western Africa, depending almost wholly for safety upon the fifty-two times she entered into the blood covenant with kings and rulers. All of which is significant and interesting as Oriental light upon the lesson. But a closer comparison is to be made by giving an incident which has been noted by us before in the teaching of this subject. We refer to the experience of General Ulysses S. Grant when he was traveling in Egypt. He was invited by the consul at Assiout to visit his home. The invitation was accepted, and for two weeks before the event the consul had men at work preparing the road over which General Grant would travel. On the day when he was expected to arrive, heralds were sent out to meet him, and when he reached the domain of his host, an ox, garlanded with flowers, was brought out and slain; it was cut in two pieces, which were laid on one side and the other; then General Grant was invited by his host to pass with him between the pieces and enter his home. By that act they became "blood brothers." It was in that part of the world the highest expression of good will.

David and Jonathan were "blood brothers" (I Sam. 18: 1-4). That relationship prevented Jonathan from having any jealousy of David when it was known that David was to be the successor of King Saul. Jonathan said to David, "Thou shalt be king over Israel, and I shall be next unto thee." Not only was there a personal covenant between David and Jonathan, but between their "houses" (families, I Sam. 20: 16). Therefore, when Jonathan had died, David was led to inquire, "Is there yet any left of the house of Saul, that I may show him kindness for Jonathan's sake?" And Mephibosheth, lame in both his feet, son of Jonathan, was brought to King David, who said to him: "I will surely show thee kindness for Jonathan thy father's sake, and will restore thee all the land of Saul thy father; and thou shalt eat bread at my table continually" (II Sam. 9: 1-8).

It was a great condescension on the part of God to enter into a covenant with man. Not alone with Abraham did he do this. God covenanted with Abraham, Isaac, Jacob (Ex. 2: 24); God covenanted with nations (Jer. 31: 31-33); God covenanted with Israel in Egypt (Ex. 12: 7-13). So far we have been studying old covenants that passed away with Old Testament times, but they were but the promises of the new blood covenant, "which is poured out for many for the remission of sins" (Matt. 26: 26-28). In this covenant between God and man, Jesus himself was the Victim, his body was torn by the thorns, the nails and the spear. Study especially the first 23 verses of Heb. 10, the chapter from which our Golden Text is taken.

OUR SUNDAY SCHOOL SUPERINTENDENTS' ROUND TABLE

—THE WAY I HAVE found to get everybody to sing heartily is to have a good live superintendent or choir-leader lead the singing.

The Men and Religion Movement has increased the number of male scholars in our school, but not teachers.

Parents do not do their share of religious teaching at home.

There is no objection to organizing a Young People's Department, which shall include religious work, athletics and recreations.

The worst fault in the Sunday school is the non-attendance of the church and church-going people. If they attend morning worship, they go home after service, and do not appear interested in the Sunday school after special invitation to remain.—L. E. J., Maine.

—SUGGESTIONS: Organize a Sunday school choir of some of the best singers, and have them meet at least once a week for special training. It might be well to have this choir sit together, or stand in front together to lead the school in the singing. Or even a better plan would be to have them scattered through the school, wearing a choir badge, thus making them leaders in groups of scholars. In the Ruggles Street Church of Boston, this plan was tried in the church congregation, and the quality of congregational singing was greatly improved. A cornet, when not played too loudly, helps the singing. A flute or violin adds much to the beauty of the music. All schools should be taught to sing some hymns from memory, as a way of storing the minds and hearts of the scholars with sweet help against times of temptation and sorrow. Occasionally an interesting service might be conducted by having a few strains of several hymns played, and asking the scholars to sing one verse of each without looking at their books. As often as possible have selections of the world's grandest music played as "Influence" upon the scholars, requesting them to sit in reverent stillness—such compositions as "The Creation," "The Messiah," etc. This will be all the more impressive if these selections are made in harmony with the lessons taught and if the scholars are told, "This is what great composers thought and expressed about the subject we are studying to-day."

—PARENTS MIGHT DO MORE religious teaching at home if Sunday school officers and teachers would indicate ways of co-operation. This subject would seem to be a live wire, seeing that at a recent meeting of the Sunday School Superintendents' Union in Boston, the following topics were discussed: "Does the average child receive any religious training at home?" "What are parents doing already to co-operate with the Sunday school teacher?" "Do the present Home Departments make for such co-operation?" "Should the Sunday school provide a class for parents?" These topics were said to have been discussed in a very lively fashion. We could wish that we might have some account of their findings. Possibly some of the superintendents who read THE CHRISTIAN HERALD might give us some accounts of their successes or failures to induce more religious training in homes. In England the children of Christian parents are not much found in the Sunday school, but only those who have not Christian parents. Mrs. Crafts was once being entertained in the home of one of the leaders of Sunday schools in England. There were seven sons and one daughter in the family, and none of them went to Sunday school. Mrs. Crafts remarked to the mother: "It seems very strange to me that none of Mr. C——'s children go to Sunday school." The mother replied: "It would seem very strange to me if they did go, because Mr. C——'s children have a Christian mother." The best way is to have home and Sunday school working together.

These New Spring Gowns Were Made With Diamond Dyes

"This new spring dress of mine I made over from a pink crepe de chine which I dyed dark green, and selected the model from the——Fashion Book."
LAURA M. TIFFANY, NEW YORK

"I am glad to send you a photograph of my latest Diamond Dye Dress. I made this over from some pale yellow messaline material which I had in a dress last spring. I dyed it brown. Isn't it stylish?"
ETHEL L. DE MOTTE, NEW YORK

You, too, can solve dress problems with Diamond Dyes. You need not hesitate to dye your most costly garments. There is no knack or secret about using Diamond Dyes. They are as easy to use as soap.

Diamond Dyes

There are two classes of Diamond Dyes—one for Wool or Silk, the other for Cotton, Linen, or Mixed Goods. Diamond Dyes for Wool or Silk come in Blue envelopes. Diamond Dyes for Cotton, Linen, or Mixed Goods come in White envelopes.

Here's the Truth About Dyes for Home Use

Our experience of over thirty years has proven that no one dye will successfully color every fabric.

There are two classes of fabrics: animal fibre fabrics, and vegetable fibre fabrics.

Wool and Silk are animal fibre fabrics. Cotton and Linen are vegetable fibre fabrics. "Union" or "Mixed" goods are 60% to 80% Cotton—so must be treated as vegetable fibre fabrics.

Vegetable fibres require one class of dye, and animal fibres another and radically different class of dye. As proof—we call attention to the fact that manufacturers of woolen goods use one class of dye, while manufacturers of cotton goods use an entirely different class of dye.

Do Not Be Deceived

For these reasons we manufacture one class of Diamond Dyes for coloring Cotton, Linen, or Mixed Goods, and another class of Diamond Dyes for coloring Wool or Silk, so that you may obtain the very best results on EVERY fabric.

REMEMBER: To get the best possible results in coloring Cotton, Linen, or Mixed Goods, use the Diamond Dyes manufactured especially for Cotton, Linen, or Mixed Goods.

AND REMEMBER: To get the best possible results in coloring Wool or Silk, use the Diamond Dyes manufactured especially for Wool or Silk.

Diamond Dyes are sold at the uniform price of 10c per package

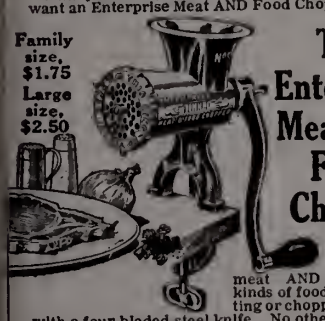
What You Want is a Chopper That Chops—Not Mangles

When you go to buy a Chopper, understand what you want—and then get it.

What you want, and what you should say, is: "I want an Enterprise Meat AND Food Chopper."



Family size, $1.75
Large size, $2.50

The Enterprise Meat AND Food Chopper

is made to chop both meat AND all other kinds of food. The cutting or chopping is done with a four-bladed steel knife. No other gives this correct chopping cut. It is a real chopper.

Cutting meat is the big, the economical, the nine-days-out-of-ten use for a chopper.

Ask yourself if you would not rather have cleanly chopped food than mangled or crushed food. There's a difference in the very sound of the words—just as big a difference in the appetizing and nutritious qualities of the foods themselves. It is the great utilizer of left-over bits of food. It saves instead of wastes. Its use is economy in living and better living. It keeps down table expenses.

If you want a still lower-priced machine, our standard pattern Enterprise Food Chopper will be found to do good work and be very satisfactory.

DAILY MEDITATION
FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR
BY REV. J. H. JOWETT, D. D.

SUNDAY, February 23. Psalm 115. "The Lord hath been mindful of us: he will bless us." In that joyful assurance there is both retrospect and prospect. There is the trodden pathway of Providence and there is the star of hope! The eyes are steadied and refreshed in sacred memories, and then they gaze into the future with serene and happy confidence. And so the Ebenezer of the soul becomes both a thanksgiving and a reconsecration.

Now perhaps our hopes are thin because our praises are scanty. Perhaps our expectations are clouded because our memories are dim. There is nothing so quickens hope as a journey among the mercies of our yesterdays. The heart lays aside its fears amid the accumulated blessings of our God. Worries pass away like cloudlets in the warmth of a summer's morning. And the recollections of God's goodness always make summer even in the wintriest day.

Now I see why the New Testament is so urgent in the matter of praise. Without praise many other virtues and graces cannot be born. Without praise they have no breath of life. Praise quickens a radiant company of heavenly presences, and among them is the shining spirit of hope.

MONDAY, February 24. Genesis 15: 5-18. "And he brought him forth abroad, and said, Look now toward heaven!" The tent was changed for the sky! Abraham sat moodily in his tent! God brought him forth beneath the stars. And that is always the line of the divine leading. He brings us forth out of our small imprisonments and he sets our feet in a large place. He desires for us height and breadth of view. For "as the heavens are high above the earth," so are his thoughts higher than our thoughts, and his ways than our ways. He wishes us, I say, to exchange the tent for the sky, and to live and move in great, spacious thoughts of his purposes and will.

How is it with our love? Is it a thing of the tent or of the sky? Does it range over mighty spaces seeking benedictions for a multitude? Or does it dwell in selfish seclusion, imprisoned in merely selfish quest? How is it with our prayers? How big are they? Will a tent contain them, or do they move with the scope and greatness of the heavens? Do they just contain our own families, or is China in them, and India, and "the uttermost parts of the earth?" "Look now toward the heavens!" Such must be our outlook if we are the companions of God.

TUESDAY, February 25. Genesis 17: 1-8. "I will establish my covenant." The good promises of God are never revoked. They are like springs which know no shrinking in times of drought. Nay, in time of drought they reveal a richer fulness. The promises are confirmed in the hour of my need, and the greater my need the greater is my bounty. And so it was that the apostle Paul came to "rejoice in his infirmities," for through his infirmities he discovered the riches of divine grace. He brought a bigger pitcher to the fountain, and he always carried it away full. "As thy days, so shall thy strength be."

So I need never fear that the promise of yesterday will exhaust itself before to-morrow. God's covenant goes with us like the ever-fresh waters of the wilderness. "They drank of that rock which followed them, and that rock was Christ." Every fulfilment of God's promise is the pledge of one to come.

God has no road without its springs. If his path stretches across the waste wilderness the "fountains shall break out in the desert," and "the wilderness shall rejoice and blossom as the rose."

WEDNESDAY, February 26. Exodus 6: 2-8. "I appeared unto Abraham. . . . I will be to you a God." The covenant made with the father was renewed to the children. The father's death did not disannul the promise of the Lord. Death has no power in the realms of grace. His moth and his rust can never destroy the ministries of divine love. Abraham died and was laid to rest, but the river of life flowed on, and the bounties of the Lord never failed. The village well quenches the thirst of many generations. And so is it through the generations with the wells of grace and salvation. The villagers have not to dig a new well when the patriarch dies: "the river of God is full of water."

And thus I am privileged to share the spiritual resources of Abraham, and the still richer resources of the apostle Paul. Nothing was given to him that is withheld from me. He is like a great mountaineer, and he has climbed to lofty heights. But I need not be dismayed. All the strength that was given to him, in which he reached those lofty places, is mine also. I may share his elevation and his triumph. "For the promise is unto you and your children, and to all that are afar off."

THURSDAY, February 27. I Peter 1: 1-9. "An inheritance incorruptible." I am writing these words in the island of Arran. To-morrow I shall leave the land behind, but I shall take the landscape with me! It will be with me in the coming winter, and I shall gaze upon Goat Fell in the streets of New York. The land is a temporary possession, the landscape abides!

The praise of men often dies with the shout that proclaims it. Another idol appears and the feverish worship is transferred to him. The world's garland begins to fade as soon as it is laid upon the brow. The morning after the coronation I possess a handful of withering leaves. But the garland of God's praise acquires new grace and beauty with the years. It is never so fresh and flourishing as just when everything else is fading away. It is glorious in the hour of death! The soul goes, wearing her garland, into the presence of the gracious Lord who gave it.

We can begin even now to wear the flowers of paradise. We can begin even now to furnish our minds with lovely thoughts and memories. We can have "the mind of Christ."

FRIDAY, February 28. Psalm 105: 1-15. "Count your blessings!" Yes, but over what area shall I look for them? There is my personal life. Let me search in every corner. I have found forget-me-nots on many a rutty road. I have found wild roses behind a barricade of nettles. Professor Miall has a lecture on "The botany of a railway station." He found something graceful

DEPARTMENT OF INVESTMENT COUNSEL

This department is maintained for the benefit of our regular readers; the service is offered entirely free of cost to them, and all correspondence is strictly personal and confidential, in so far as the identity of the inquirer is concerned. Always enclose letter postage and write name and address plainly, addressing your inquiry to Financial Editor, CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York City.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD does not in any way guarantee investment advertisements. It is impossible to do so, because our subscribers have far more money to invest than our total capital would permit us to refund. We do all we can, however, to make sure of the integrity of our advertisers before admitting them to our columns. Also, any advice given is an expression of our conclusions, based upon information we believe to be reliable; but we must not be held responsible, should any loss arise from its acceptance.

ANSWERS TO FINANCIAL QUERIES

M. R., NEW YORK. I have failed to find a market for your Delineator stock. So far as I can discover there has not been a public transaction of this stock in two years. The publication is controlled by the Butterick Company. Possibly if you write to the latter, you will receive an offer.

D. S., NEW YORK. (1) I should accept the offer of Brooks & Company, although it is almost impossible to secure definite information upon which to base positive advice, and I make this suggestion through inferences I have drawn from casual remarks heard relative to the company. (2) I cannot tell whether the company itself seeks to buy in your stock, but think this is not the case. If you sell your stock put the proceeds into good $100 or $500 bonds, which have a market on the New York Stock Exchange.

A. E. S., WISCONSIN. I regret that it is beyond the province of this department to give advice about the climate of the Southern States. I can, however, and do advise, and advise most positively, against any of our readers buying land in Florida or any other State which they have not seen. It is my belief that nine persons out of ten that accept these land company propositions are disappointed when they finally move their residence to the State where they have bought the land. It never turns out as they expect it will.

H. S., NEW JERSEY. (1) You ask for an explanation of Western Maryland common stock's low price, and state that you hold some of it at $51. You ask if there is something better to deal in. This stock is a speculative issue, and is not recommended. With the passing of the dividend on the preferred stock the common stock slumped in price with the preferred, but with improving market conditions it is likely to go higher, and you may get out without a loss. Then put your money into a standard, dividend-paying railway, such as Atchison, Pennsylvania, Northern Pacific, Union Pacific, Great Northern, or St. Paul. This advice comprehends the purchase of these stocks on a strictly investment basis, and under no consideration do I advise their purchase from a speculative viewpoint, although this, too, may be attractive at present prices. Approved public utility securities are also recommended. (2) I do not favor Butterick Stock.

W. F., MASSACHUSETTS. The British Columbia Coal Mining Company has been absorbed by the British Columbia Amalgamated Coal Company, which was incoroprated February 17, 1906, under the laws of Arizona. This latter company has acquired by lease control of 17,000 acres of coal lands in Nicola Valley, British Columbia, which were formerly controlled by the British Columbia Coal Company and two other similar companies. These lands are held by Crown leases. From my latest report regarding this enterprise I judge the company is not shipping.

N. I. L., VERMONT. The security company seems to have passed out of existence. The superintendent of the building where they were located at 37 Wall Street tells me they moved out a year ago. I got track of them at an uptown address, 103 Park Avenue, but was told at that building that they had disappeared and nothing was known of their present whereabouts. I do not believe that any of the companies promoted by the concern has made any success or that the stocks have any market value. One of the members of this firm, who was its directing head, promoted at Los Angeles, in former years, a great many oil companies, and I think none of them lived beyond the prospect stage.

W. R., VIRGINIA. The electric railway stock you have under consideration is not recommended. Your money will be much safer invested in a standard railroad stock, such as Atchison, Great Northern preferred, Northern Pacific, Pennsylvania, or St. Paul. All of these stocks are somewhat speculative and perhaps should, after all, not be recommended to a woman. A railroad, public utility, or industrial bond is preferable because non-speculative, and while it will return a smaller income, the safety is sometimes worth paying for. I shall be glad to advise with you further in the matter of investment if you will request me to do so, and state about how much money you have for investment purposes.

and exquisite in the midst of its soot and grime. So I must look at the dark patches of life, among my disappointments and defeats, and even there I shall find tokens of the Lord's presence, some flowers of his planting.

And there is my share in the life of the nation. "Ye seed of Abraham his servant, ye children of Jacob his chosen." There are hands that stretch out to me from past days, laden with bequests of privilege and freedom. Our feet "stand in a large place," and the place was cleared by the fidelity and the courage of the men of old. I have countless blessings that were bought with blood. The red marks of sacrifice are over all my daily ways. Let me not take the inheritance and overlook the blood-marks, and stride about as though it were nought but common ground. Mercies abound on every hand! "Count your blessings!"

SATURDAY, March 1. Nehemiah 9: 6-11. "Thou hast performed thy words: for thou art righteous." Frances Ridley Havergal kept a journal of mercies. She had a record book, and she crowded it with her remembrances of God's goodness. She was always on the lookout for tokens of the Lord's grace and bounty, and she found them everywhere. Everywhere she had communion with a covenant-keeping God. The Bible became to her more and more the history of her own life and experience. Promise after promise told the story of her own triumphs. She appropriated the goodness of God, and she set her own seal to the testimony that God is true.

Many a complaining life would be changed into music and song by a journal of mercies. Many a fear can be dispersed by a ready remembrance. Memory can be made the handmaid of hope. Yesterday's blessing can kindle the courage of to-day. That is the purposed ministry of "the days that have been." We are to harness the strength of their experiences to the tasks and burdens of to-day; and in the remembrance of God's providences we shall march through our difficulties with song.

These Daily Meditations will appear in each issue through 1913.

CONCERNING FRIENDS

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

WHEN I was a very little girl, I remember that my family moved to a new town, and although it was a very pretty little town, with trees and flowers to delight the heart of an im-native city child, I remember that I did not enjoy the green lawns, or the bells, or the gay blossoms. Then one day, I remember, I sat down in a corner with my favorite doll in my arms and cried—cried because I wanted a little girl to play with! For I was lonely.

Margaret E. Sangster, Jr.

Did you ever feel as if you wanted a friend — some one you could confide in, and tell your silly little dreams to; one who would not listen with the amused superiority of years of experience, or laugh at you? Of course, you probably all have friends, dear chums that you love very much; and yet, don't you sometimes hesitate to tell them things, because—well, because you know them too well? And sometimes when the world looks pretty black and unkind and hopeless, don't you wish you could talk to some one who would sympathize with you? I have a little proposition to make: Suppose you let me be your friend, and tell me some of your troubles; and although, maybe, I cannot help you the least little bit, you will know that all the time I am thinking of you and wondering about you and loving you. Because that is what a friend means. Maybe I shall be able to help you, and then perhaps you will think about me and like me just a little bit, too.

The Lonely Girl

Perhaps you will some time be lonely, away out in a farmhouse, in the midst of a big, white snowstorm; or at boarding-school for the first time, away from all the home people. Or at that time you could sit down and write me a little note, or perhaps a good-sized letter, telling just what is in your mind, it might make you feel a little bit more happy and not quite so alone in the world. Then there are other things, oh, so many of them! that you can write to a friend about. Maybe you want something to read, and don't know just what kind of a story is good as well as thrilling, or just what classic is interesting and colorful. Maybe you will want to know something about dresses or hats, or birthday presents, or any of the things that girls love. If I were your friend, don't you suppose I would like to talk about those things, too?

Some girls have the mistaken idea that they do not need the society and companionship of other girls. Many self-satisfied young ladies have said to me in perfect seriousness: "I don't need any friends, and I am perfectly happy without them!" But some time these same positive young people may want a friend very much indeed. Still other girls have said to me: "Girl friends cannot be trusted, but boys can! With my brother's chums, and my own masculine circle, I have all of the companionship I need or want." But when I hear a girl talk like that, I feel sorry for her; because what girl likes to miss the little teas and parties and sewing-clubs that the rest belong to? And who would willingly give up the cozy bedtime kimono parties, when you tell your best chum all of your ideals, as she braids her hair with meditative fingers while she sympathizes and agrees?

There are different kinds of girl friends in this world, many different kinds, but there are two varieties that every one knows. One is the kind that loves you to death when you are near, and always agrees with you and praises you, even when she knows you are wrong. I mean the kind of a friend that will listen while some one talks about you in your absence, and who, though her ears are burning, will either keep perfectly still or, in a half-hearted way, nod her acquiescence. And yet in her small and rather selfish heart the girl will love you; and you will be conscious of her shortcomings, but you will love her also.

Then there is the other kind—the friend that sits down in front of you and tells you what a foolish girl you are, and just what is wrong with your viewpoints, and just what she thinks of you, but when she has almost made you cry, she kisses you, and comforts you; and you love her with the desperation of a drowning soul. And when you are away, this kind of a friend is fearfully proud of you, and when anybody dares to criticize you—rightfully perhaps—she blazes forth in your defense, or leaves the room. For she loves you as much as one girl can love another.

Now, I do want you to be my friend—the real kind of friend; the kind that loves, and will stand up for one. Because now, in the beginning of this friendship of ours, the criticisms will be keen and the fault-finders will be many; and I shall need you. We may never see each other (although I hope we shall), yet I think that we can put much love in our letters to each other.

For there's never a friend so far from you,
That a message cannot reach;
And there's never a heart so full of woe,
That a love-word cannot teach.
And there's never a soul in this sad old world,
Crushed under a weight of care,
That cannot bend to a loving friend
Who has paper, and ink—and prayer!

POLLYANNA

BY ELEANOR H. PORTER

Author of "The Story of Marco," "Into Still Waters," "The Transformation of Margaret," etc.

CHAPTER XXVI

THROUGH AN OPEN WINDOW

ONE by one the short winter days came and went—but they were not short to Pollyanna. They were long, and sometimes full of pain. Very resolutely, these days, however, Pollyanna was turning a cheerful face toward whatever came. Was she not specially bound to play the game, now that Aunt Polly was playing it, too?

Pollyanna, now, like Mrs. Snow, was crocheting wonderful things out of bright-colored worsteds that trailed their cheery lengths across the white spread and made Pollyanna—again like Mrs. Snow—"so glad she had her arms and hands, anyway!"

Pollyanna saw people now, occasionally. Once she had seen John Pendleton, and twice she had seen Jimmy Bean. John Pendleton had told her what a fine boy Jimmy was getting to be, and how well he was doing. Jimmy had told her what a first-rate home he had, and what "bang-up folks" Mr. Pendleton made; and both had said that it was all owing to her.

"Which makes me all the gladder, you know, that I have had my legs," Pollyanna confided to her aunt afterwards.

The winter passed and spring came. The anxious watchers over Pollyanna's condition could see little change wrought by the prescribed treatment. There seemed every reason to believe, indeed, that Dr. Mead's worst fears would be realized—that Pollyanna would never walk again.

Beldingsville, of course, kept itself informed concerning Pollyanna; and of Beldingsville, one man in particular fumed and fretted himself into a fever of anxiety over the daily bulletins which he managed in some way to procure from the bed of suffering. Then, one Saturday morning, Mr. John Pendleton received a call from Dr. Thomas Chilton.

"Pendleton," he began abruptly, "I've come to you because you, better than any one else in town, know something of my relations with Miss Polly Harrington."

John Pendleton did know something of the affair between Polly Harrington and Thomas Chilton, but the matter had not been mentioned between them for fifteen years or more.

"Yes?" he said, trying to make his voice sound concerned enough for sympathy, and not eager enough for curiosity.

"Pendleton, I want to see that child. I want to make an examination. I must make an examination."

"Well—can't you?"

"Can't! Pendleton, you know very well I haven't been inside that door for more than fifteen years. You don't know—but I will tell you—that the mistress of that house told me that the next time she asked me to enter it I might take it that she was begging my pardon, and that all would be as before—which meant that she'd marry me. (Perhaps you see her summoning me now—but I don't."

"But you couldn't go—without a summons?"

"Well, hardly. I have some pride, you know."

"But couldn't you swallow your pride and forget the quarrel—"

"Forget the quarrel!" interrupted the doctor, savagely. "I'm not talking of that kind of pride. So far as that is concerned, I'd go from here to there on my knees—or on my head—if that would do any good. It's professional pride I'm talking about. It's a case of sickness, and I'm a doctor. I can't butt in and say 'Here, take me!' can I? But, Pendleton, I must see that child. It may mean life or death. It will mean, I honestly believe, nine chances out of ten that Pollyanna Whittier will walk again!"

The words were spoken clearly and impressively. Thus it happened that very distinctly they reached the ears of a small boy kneeling beneath the window on the ground outside.

Jimmy Bean, at his Saturday morning task of pulling up the first little green weeds of the flower-beds, sat up with ears and eyes wide open.

"Walk? Pollyanna!" John Pendleton was saying. "What do you mean?"

"I mean that from what I can hear and learn—a mile from her bedside—that her case is very much like one that a college friend of mine has just helped. For years he's been making this sort of thing a special study. I've kept in touch with him, and studied, too, in a way. And from what I hear—but I want to see the girl!"

John Pendleton came erect in his chair.

"You must see her, man! Couldn't you—say, through Dr. Warren?"

The other shook his head.

"I'm afraid not. Warren has been very decent, though. He told me himself that he suggested consultation with me at the first, but—Miss Harrington said no so decisively that he didn't dare venture it again, even though he knew of my desire to see the child. Lately, some of his best patients have come over to me, so of course that ties my hands still more effectually. But, Pendleton, I've got to see that child! Think of what it may mean to her if I do!"

"Yes, and think of what it will mean if you don't!" retorted Pendleton.

"But how can I without a direct

AS TO FLAVOUR

Found Her Favorite Again.

A bright young lady tells how she came to be acutely sensative as to the taste of coffee.

"My health had been very poor for several years," she says. "I loved coffee and drank it for breakfast, but only learned by accident, as it were, that it was the cause of the constant, dreadful headaches from which I suffered every day, and of the nervousness that drove sleep from my pillow and so deranged my stomach that everything I ate gave me acute pain. (Tea is just as injurious, because it contains caffeine, the same drug found in coffee.)

"My condition finally got so serious that I was advised by my doctor to go to a hospital. There they gave me what I supposed was coffee, and I thought it was the best I ever drank, but I have since learned it was Postum. I gained rapidly and came home in four weeks.

"Somehow the coffee we used at home didn't taste right when I got back. I tried various kinds, but none tasted as good as that I drank in the hospital, and all brought back the dreadful headaches and the 'sick-all-over' feeling.

"One day I got a package of Postum, and the first taste of it I took, I said 'that's the good coffee we had in the hospital!' I have drank it ever since, and eat Grape-Nuts for my breakfast. I have no more headaches, and feel better than I have for years." Name given upon request. Read the famous little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a reason."

Postum now comes in concentrated, powder form, called Instant Postum. It is prepared by stirring a level teaspoonful in a cup of hot water, adding sugar to taste, and enough cream to bring the color to golden brown.

Instant Postum is convenient; there's no waste; and the flavour is always uniform. Sold by grocers—45 to 50-cup in 30 cts., 90 to 100-cup tin 50 cts.

A 5-cup trial tin mailed for grocer's name and 2-cent stamp for postage. Postum Cereal Co., Ltd., Battle Creek, Mich.

request from her aunt?—which I'll never get!"

"She must be made to ask you!"

"How?"

"I don't know."

"No, I guess you don't. She's too proud and too angry to ask me—after what she said years ago it would mean if she did ask me. But when I think of that child, doomed to lifelong misery, and when I think that maybe in my hands lies a chance of escape, but for that confounded nonsense we call pride and professional etiquette, I—"

He did not finish his sentence, but with his hands thrust deep in his pockets, he turned and began to tramp up and down the room again angrily.

"But if she could be made to see—to understand," urged John Pendleton.

"Yes; and who's going to do it?" demanded the doctor, with a savage turn.

"I don't know," groaned the other, miserably.

Outside the window Jimmy Bean stirred suddenly. Up to now he had scarcely breathed, so intently had he listened to every word.

"Well, by Jinks, I know!" he whispered, exultingly. "I'm goin' ter do it!" And forthwith he rose to his feet, crept stealthily around the corner of the house, and ran with all his might down Pendleton Hill.

CHAPTER XXVII

Jimmy Takes the Helm

"IT'S Jimmy Bean. He wants ter see ye, ma'am," announced Nancy in the doorway.

"Me?" rejoined Miss Polly, plainly surprised. "Are you sure he did not mean Miss Pollyanna?"

"He said it was you he wanted."

"Very well, I'll come down."

In the sitting-room Miss Polly found waiting for her a round-eyed, flush-faced boy, who began to speak at once.

"Ma'am, I s'pose it's dreadful—what I'm doin', an' what I'm sayin'; but I can't help it. It's for Pollyanna, and I'd walk over hot coals for her, or face you, or—or anythin' like that, any time. An' so that's why I come ter tell ye that as long as it's only pride an' et—et-something that's keepin' Pollyanna from walkin', why, I knew you would ask Dr. Chilton here if you understood—"

"Wh-at?" interrupted Miss Polly, the look of stupefaction on her face changing to one of angry indignation.

Jimmy sighed despairingly.

"There, I didn't mean ter make ye mad. That's why I begun by tellin' ye about her walkin' again. I thought you'd listen ter that."

"Jimmy, what are you talking about?"

Jimmy wet his lips determinedly.

"Well, ter begin with, Dr. Chilton come ter see Mr. Pendleton, an' they talked in the library. Do you understand that?"

"Yes, Jimmy."

"Well, the window was open, and I was weedin' the flower-bed under it; and I heard 'em talk."

"Oh, Jimmy! Listening?"

"'Twan't about me, an' 'twan't sneak-listenin'," bridled Jimmy. "And I'm glad I listened. Why, it may make Pollyanna—walk!"

"Jimmy, what do you mean?" Miss Polly was leaning forward eagerly.

"There, I told ye so," nodded Jimmy, contentedly. "Well, Dr. Chilton knows some doctor somewhere that can cure Pollyanna, he thinks—make her walk, ye know; but he can't tell sure till he sees her. And he wants to see her somethin' awful, but he told Mr. Pendleton that you wouldn't let him."

Miss Polly's face turned a vivid red.

"But, Jimmy, I—I can't—I couldn't! That is, I didn't know!" Miss Polly's hand was at her throat, tugging at her collar.

"Yes, an' that's what I came ter tell ye, so ye would know," asserted Jimmy, eagerly. "They said that for some reason—I didn't rightly catch what—you wouldn't let Dr. Chilton come, an' you told Dr. Warren so; an' Dr. Chilton couldn't come himself, without you asked him, on account of pride an' perfessional et—et—well, et-somethin', anyway. An' they were wishin' somebody could make you understand, only they didn't know who could; an' I was outside the window, an' I says ter myself right away, 'By jinks, I'll do it!' An' I come, an'—have I made ye understand?"

"Yes; but, Jimmy—about that doctor," implored Miss Polly, feverishly. "Who was he? What did he do? Are you sure he could make Pollyanna walk?"

"I don't know who he was. They didn't say. Dr. Chilton knows him, an' he's just cured somebody just like her, Dr. Chilton thinks. Anyhow, they didn't seem ter be doin' no worryin' about him. 'Twas you they was worryin' about, 'cause you wouldn't let Dr. Chilton see her. An' say—you will let him come; won't you? Now you understand."

Miss Polly turned her head away. Jimmy, watching her with anxious eyes, thought she was going to cry. But she did not cry. After a minute she said brokenly:

"Yes—I'll let—Dr. Chilton—see her. Now run home, Jimmy, quick. I've got to speak to Dr. Warren. He's upstairs now."

A little later Dr. Warren was surprised to meet an agitated, flush-faced Miss Polly in the hall. He was still more surprised to hear the lady say, a little breathlessly:

"Dr. Warren, you asked me once to allow Dr. Chilton to be called in consultation and I refused. Since then I have reconsidered. I very much desire that you should call in Dr. Chilton. Will you not ask him at once, please? Thank you."

CHAPTER XXVIII

A New Uncle

THE next time Dr. Warren entered the chamber where Pollyanna lay watching the dancing shimmer of color on the ceiling, a tall, broad-shouldered man followed close behind him.

"Dr. Chilton! Oh, Dr. Chilton! How glad I am to see you!" cried Pollyanna. And at the joyous rapture of the voice, more than one pair of eyes in the room brimmed with sudden tears. "But, of course, if Aunt Polly doesn't want—"

"It is all right, my dear, don't worry," soothed Miss Polly, agitatedly, hurrying forward. "I have told Dr. Chilton that—that I want him to look you over—with Dr. Warren this morning."

"Oh, then you asked him to come here," murmured Pollyanna, contentedly.

"Yes, dear, I asked him. That is—"

But it was too late. The adoring happiness that had leaped to Dr. Chilton's eyes was unmistakable, and Miss Polly had seen it. With very pink cheeks she turned and left the room hurriedly.

Over in the window the nurse and Dr. Warren were talking earnestly. Dr. Chilton held out both his hands to Pollyanna.

"Little girl, I'm thinking that one of the very gladdest jobs you ever did has been done to-day," he said in a voice shaken with emotion.

At twilight a wonderfully tremulous, wonderfully different Aunt Polly crept to Pollyanna's bedside. The nurse was at supper. They had the room to themselves.

"Pollyanna, dear, I'm going to tell you—the first one of all. Some day I'm going to give Dr. Chilton to you for your uncle. And it's you that have done it all. Oh, Pollyanna, I'm so happy! and so glad!"

Pollyanna began to clap her hands;

Questions and Answers

I. M. K., Grace, Idaho. How much coal is consumed daily in driving one of the big steamships across the Atlantic?

The coal consumption depends upon the rate of speed, the make of the engines and the boilers. The amount required increases much faster than the rate of increase of speed. For instance, a vessel of about 10,000 gross tonnage going at a speed of ten knots would burn up about fifty tons of coal daily, while the same vessel pushed at a speed of twenty knots would demand over three hundred tons a day. Some of the big ocean liners consume as much as four hundred tons daily, or about two thousand tons for a single trip across the Atlantic.

A. S., Choctaw, Miss. Will you please quote the poem in which the following lines occur and state the author?

"Blessings on thee, little man,
Barefoot boy with face of tan."

These are the opening lines of the poem by John Greenleaf Whittier, entitled "The Barefoot Boy," much too long to be given here.

M. A. B. K., Chicago, Ill. (1) Please explain II Cor. 12: 2; (2) 1 Cor. 11: 22; (3) Rev. 21: 9.

(1) In this passage (II Cor. 12: 2-4) Paul is doubtless referring to a particular time at which he received a remarkable spiritual uplift and blessing. We cannot tell what his vision was like or describe the experience he had, but the Scriptures relate a number of similar events in the lives of saints; they have occurred all through the Christian era, as well as earlier. The experience of Jacob at Peniel, of Isaiah in the temple, of Ezekiel and other prophets, the experience of the three disciples on the Mount of Transfiguration were, at least in some respects, probably like this. (2) Paul is here finding fault with the Corinthian Christians because some of their number made the Lord's Supper the occasion of overindulgence. In celebrating this event the custom of the early Christians seems to have been the partaking of a full meal, rather than a morsel of food and taste of wine. To make such a function the occasion of overeating or overdrinking was, of course, a sin. (3) John's heavenly companion here invites him to come to see a vision of the final, triumphant church. Throughout the New Testament Epistles and the Revelation the church is referred to as the Bride of Christ.

A. D., Manchester, Mich. Was Judas a devil when he was chosen, or was his sin suggested to him by Satan at or about the time of the Last Supper?

Little is known of the life of Judas before his appearance among the apostles. He was probably drawn by the Baptist's preaching, or by his own ambitious hopes of the coming of a Messianic kingdom, in which he might play an important and lucrative part. He seems to have declared himself a disciple of Jesus, as the others did, and as he was intrusted with the finances of the little company, we may judge that he enjoyed a measure of confidence, although this seems to have been undeserved. (See John 12: 6.) That Jesus himself knew the heart of Judas from the beginning is made clear from the text you quote. See also John 6: 64-71. He knew his inmost thoughts and his criminal confidences with the priests, which culminated in the betrayal. See John 18: 3-5. The act of betrayal was not the outcome of a sudden impulse at the Last Supper, but was the closing scene in a long career of deceit and treachery.

R. P. M., Glasscock, Texas. Please state the greatest battle of modern times, by whom fought, and the number killed.

The battle of Mukden, lasting from February 24 to March 10, 1905, in which 350,000 Russians and 400,000 Japanese took part; 125,000 of the former were killed and 50,000 of the latter.

Virginia H., Berea, Va. Please explain Mark 4: 11, 12. These two verses are something of a stumbling-block to me.

The word "mystery," here as in certain other places in Scripture, is not used in the classical sense of religious secrets or things incomprehensible, but of things of purely divine revelation—matters foreshadowed in the ancient economy and then only partially understood, but now fully published under the Gospel (see I Cor. 2: 6, 10; Eph. 3: 3, 6, 8, 9). The mysteries of the kingdom meant those great Gospel truths which at that time none but the disciples could appreciate and even they only in part, while to those without (whose hearts had not yet been opened to the Gospel) they were like tales and fables, subjects of entertainment rather than divine truths. Such persons saw but recognized not, and heard but understood not, for their spiritual sight and understanding were judicially sealed by sin. From obdurate rejection of the Gospel, and their obstinacy in preferring darkness to light, they had become morally incapable of acceptance and totally indifferent. (See prophecy of Isa. 6: 9, 10, then read contrasting passage in Matt. 13: 16).

T. F. H., Big Spring, Texas. From the information in the Bible, do you suppose heaven is a land with beautiful streams of pure sparkling water and green trees? Do you suppose its inhabitants will eat, drink, work and live in houses, and do you think that the husband and wife and children will be reunited, and will know each other there?

Of heaven itself and the blessedness in the life to come, we know only what is revealed in the Scriptures, and it is not possible, from such limited knowledge, to form any adequate conception. The Bible describes the happiness of heaven in general terms. See Rom. 8: 18, but even as she brought her small palms together the first time, she stopped, and held them suspended.

"Aunt Polly, Aunt Polly, were you the woman's hand and heart he wanted so long ago? You were—I know you were! And that's what he meant by saying I'd done the gladdest job of all—to-day. I'm so glad! Why, Aunt Polly, I don't know but I'm so glad that I don't mind—even my legs, now!"

Aunt Polly swallowed a sob.

"Perhaps, some day, dear—"

But Aunt Polly did not finish. Aunt Polly did not dare to tell, yet, the great hope that Dr. Chilton had put into her heart. But she did say this:

"Pollyanna, next week you're going to take a journey. On a nice comfortable little bed you're going to be carried in cars and carriages to a great doctor who has a big house many miles from here made on purpose for just such people as you are. He's a dear friend of Dr. Chilton's, and we're going to see what he can do for you!"

CHAPTER XXIX

WHICH IS A LETTER FROM POLLYANNA

DEAR AUNT POLLY AND UNCLE TOM: Oh, I can—I can—I can walk! I did to-day all the way from my bed to the window! It was six steps. My, how good it was to be on legs again!

All the doctors stood around and smiled, and all the nurses stood beside of them and cried. A lady in the next ward, who walked last week first, peeked into the door, and another one who hopes she can walk next month, was invited in to the party, and she laid on my nurse's bed and clapped her hands. Even Black Tilly, who washes the floor, looked through the piazza window and called me "honey child" when she wasn't crying too much to call me anything.

I don't see why they cried. I wanted to sing and shout and yell! Oh, oh, oh! Just think, I can walk—walk—walk! Now I don't mind being here almost ten months, and I didn't miss the wedding, anyhow. Wasn't that just like you, Aunt Polly, to come on here and get married right beside my bed, so I could see you! You always do think of the gladdest things!

And pretty soon I shall go home. I wish I could walk all the way there. I do. I don't think I shall ever want to ride anywhere any more. It will be so good just to walk. Oh, I'm so glad! I'm glad for everything. Why, I'm glad now I lost my legs for a while, for you never, never know how perfectly lovely legs are till you haven't got them—that go, I mean. I'm going to walk eight steps to-morrow.

With heaps of love to everybody,
POLLYANNA.

22; II Cor. 4: 17, 18. It is described as a kingdom (Matt. 25: 1); as a place of rest; as a place where knowledge will go on to perfection, and as a state in which the saints will dwell together. It will be a place of complete felicity, where the enjoyment will be heightened by friendly intercourse. It is further described as having a city with everlasting foundations; a place of innumerable homes (see John 14: 2); a place where we shall meet our loved ones and our children (see II Sam. 12: 23; Luke 16: 25). John in Rev. 22 tells us of the "pure river of water of life" and "the tree of life with its abundance of fruits." Beyond these little is disclosed; but we have enough to assure us that it is a place of great happiness (see I Cor. 2: 9); of blessed reunions where there are eternal youth and strength and where sorrow, sighing, pain and the afflictions that wound us in this life are unknown (see I Cor. 2: 9).

S. M. P., Talbot, Md. Where is the longest bridge in the world? Give its dimensions.

The bridge over the Firth of Forth, Scotland; it is 8,296 feet long, has a span of 1,710 feet, and is of the cantilever type.

M. B. C., San Diego, Calif. How is the distance of a star measured?

Measuring the distance of a star is one of the triumphs of modern astronomy made possible by mathematics. The parallax or apparent change in an object (not too far off) when viewed from two different points enables a calculation to be made, as we have a base line (the distance between the two points) and the angle made by the two lines from the point of observation to the object observed. In this way the distance of the moon, sun and nearer planets is determined by "taking" them from different points on the earth's surface. But with a star it is different. It is so far away that it seems never to change its position, even when viewed from points 8,000 miles or the whole diameter of the earth apart. How, then, do astronomers obtain points far enough separated from which to take measurements? By taking the diameter of the earth's orbit as their base line. This is 186,000,000 miles long or more than 23,000 times that of the earth. The observation of the star to be measured is taken at one point in the earth's orbit, and again six months later, when the earth is at the opposite point, or 186,000,000 miles removed from the other. Even at such great distance the parallax is very slight. No star has yet presented one second (the smallest division of the circle) in change, which would show that it was within nineteen trillion miles of the earth. None is so near to us.

Chalmers 1913 MOTOR CARS

Made in Chalmers Shops

Let's Reason Together —About Price

To you who are considering buying a motor car, we want to offer a few suggestions on the subject of price. They are based on the experience of thousands of buyers.

First of all: Buy a real car. Don't economize too closely on the purchase price. Economy is not merely spending the least money. And buying an automobile at too low a price is the worst economy in the world.

If a man is going to pay $1000 for a motor car, he surely is not so pressed for funds that he could not add enough more to that $1000 to get him a really high grade motor car—a car of genuine quality. The additional cost, distributed over the years he will use the quality car, is nothing compared to the satisfaction of owning it from the start.

If you don't get a car of real quality to start on, you will surely want one later. Many who purchase low priced cars graduate from what they buy to what they should have had to begin with. But in doing this they pay from $300 to $600 for so-called "automobile experience."

You don't need this costly experience. Save the money. Buy a quality car to start with.

Examine the 1913 Chalmers "Thirty-Six" at $1950, fully equipped, and see if you really are not money in pocket by laying out the extra few hundred dollars in the original purchase price rather than buying a car at a lesser price only to trade it in later on at a big discount.

Note these splendid features of the 1913 Chalmers cars:

Electric lights, Turkish cushions, Nickel trimmings.
4-forward speed transmission, 11-inch upholstery.
New flush-sided bodies, Chalmers self-starter.
Demountable rims, Long stroke motor, Big wheels and tires.
Carburetor dash adjustment, Speedometer.

"30" (4 cyl. 30 h. p.), $1600 "Thirty-six" (4 cyl. 36 h. p.), $1950
"Six" (6 cyl. 54 h. p.), $2400

A Pure Wash Silk

Why is this a Wash Silk? It is woven from pure silk as taken from the cocoons with all the gum left in it. The gum is then boiled and washed out and the fabric ironed. After that this "AUBURN" Wash Silk can be washed and ironed any number of times the same as pure cotton or linen. And remember that pure silk is the strongest fibre known. "AUBURN" Wash Silk is honestly woven of heavy fibres. Ordinary wash silk is usually made of light fibres to meet jobbing and retail competition. We sell only from Mill to Consumers, saving you the jobbing and retail profit, so that our prices are considerably lower and our quality is always maintained. We guarantee satisfaction or gladly refund money.

Compo-Board

Is an Improvement Over Lath and Plaster

DON'T THINK of Compo-Board as a substitute for lath and plaster. It's an improvement—better in every way—stronger, more durable; warmer in winter, cooler in summer; resists fire much longer; smoother; lends itself more readily to any desired scheme of decoration, whether with paint, kalsomine or wall paper. It is cheaper in the long run—much cheaper—because it lasts longer, never needs repairing, will not mar when furniture is knocked against it, holds wall paper longer. Its many advantages far outweigh its economy.

The cross-section view at the bottom reveals the unique construction that gives Compo-Board its desirable features. The core or "backbone" is a layer of kiln-dried wood slats; on each side of this is a layer of airtight cement, then on the outside layers of specially prepared paper—the whole pressed under intense heat into a straight, stiff sheet ¼ inch thick.

This Free Sample Will Convince You

It will give you a chance to test, compare and prove all we claim. Our interesting books are also well worth while reading. Just send your name and address.

Compo-Board is sold in strips four feet wide and one to eighteen feet long by dealers in nearly every town.

Manufacturers are finding many profitable uses for Compo-Board. It is better than wood for many purposes. Write for the experience letters from some of them.

Emperor William's Creed

THE German Emperor William II is, undoubtedly, the most interesting personality among the rulers of Europe. The best way to find out what he believes and what he does not believe is to quote his own words. To the students at Bonn he said:

"Whether we are modern people, or whether we work on this field or that—if we don't place our life on the basis of religion, we are lost. Therefore, I will here publicly confess that I place the whole empire, the whole people, myself and my house [family] under the cross and under the protection of Him of whom the great apostle Peter said, 'There is no other happiness and no other name given to man in which he can be saved,' and who said of himself, 'Heaven and earth shall perish, but my words will never perish.'"

To his sons at their confirmation he said: "In your instructions you have read and heard many sublime and beautiful words of great statesmen and poets which have elevated and inspired you. And what German youth will not feel his soul filled with enthusiasm by the words of our Koerner and of our Arndt! But they are human words. Nothing equals the words of our Saviour. And this I say to you, so that when in the near future, in the whirlpool of life, you hear different opinions about religion, principally about the person of our Saviour, you may be able to defend it. No words of a human being have ever been able to inspire people of all races and of all nations to one and the same aim, namely, to emulate him, and if necessary, to lay down their lives for him. And this miracle can only be explained by the fact that the words he said are words of the living God, which bring life, and will live after thousands of years, when the words of the wise men have been forgotten."

To the president of the Swiss Republic he said: "I hold to the Bible, which I constantly read. In it one finds the solution of every difficulty and every problem, even of a political nature."

In the workroom of the emperor hangs a scroll which gives us an insight to his character. Some years ago it was published in the Chicago Tribune. It reads:

"To be strong in pain; not to wish what is unattainable or worthless; to be content with the day as it comes; to seek all that is good, and enjoy mankind and nature as they are, once for all; to be comforted with one single happy hour for a thousand bitter ones, and from our heart and with all our ability to always give our best even if we don't receive thanks. Whosoever learns this and can do it is happy, free, and can be proud; his life will always be beautiful. Whosoever is distrustful commits a wrong towards others and harms himself. It is our duty to consider all men good as long as they do not prove to us the contrary. The world is so great, and we mortals are so small, that certainly everything cannot turn around us alone. If something harms us that pains, who knows whether it is not necessary for the benefit of the whole creation? In everything in the world, whether it is dead or breathes, lives the great wise will of the Almighty and Omniscient Creator; only we small, insignificant mortals have not the sense to comprehend it. As everything is, so it must be in the world, and, however it may be, it always is good in the mind of the Creator." CARL THEODOR WETTSTEIN.

Delighted with Twilight Tales

I have received the book, Twilight Tales, and wish to say it is just lovely, so much like the author who has passed into the beautiful life. The influence of her life will linger long to bless. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD I have taken ever so long. I can't say enough in praise of it. It certainly is a treasure. The many readers of the paper could not make a better holiday present than to send a year's subscription to some friend or to some home that has no Christian paper. What little I have done to help has been well repaid. I would advise all your readers to try it. MRS M. L. MORTON.

No-Rim-Cut Tires 10% Oversize

We're Building This Year for 500,000 Cars

At this writing the output on Goodyear automobile tires exceeds 6,000 daily.

As fast as possible we are bringing the output up to 8,000 tires a day.

For the evidence is that this year's demand will call for 2,000,000 tires.

Half the New Cars

Our contracts with makers insure, at the minimum, that nearly half of this year's new cars will go out with Goodyear tires.

Forty-three per cent of all show cars had them at the New York Show.

And the present demand for these favorite tires is seven times larger than two years ago.

What Did It?

Ask yourself what brought these tires to the topmost place in Tiredom. Remember that men are not buying tires blindly. These are days of odometers. Men are comparing tires.

These hundreds of thousands who have come to the Goodyear must have a reason for it. And that reason, you must own, is based on mileage records.

Men, in these days, insist that tires shall not rim-cut. And that means Goodyear No-Rim-Cut tires.

They know that oversize means extra mileage. And No-Rim-Cut tires are 10 per cent oversize.

Please Find Out

For your own sake, find out this year why Goodyear tires far outsell all others.

Other motorists have tested our almost 2,000,000 Goodyears. Their verdict is shown by our present sales records.

This verdict, agreed with by hundreds of thousands, is sure to be your verdict also. And the average saving to those who know it is almost half one's tire bills.

Write for the Goodyear Tire Book—14th-year edition. It tells all known ways to economize on tires.

SOME GARDEN NOTES

STARTING THE TOMATOES

PLANT the seed in a hotbed or box in a window from forty to fifty days before the time when the plants are to be set outdoors. Cover a quarter of an inch deep, using only rich, sifted soil. The plants grow best in a temperature of around 80 degrees during the day and 65 degrees at night. When the seedlings are one or two inches high, transplant them to another box or hotbed, four inches apart, or, better, set each in a three-inch flower-pot, so they may be planted outdoors without injury to the roots.

In the garden, after danger of frost is over, set the plants in rows five feet apart, with the plants four feet apart in the row. Drive a heavy four-foot stake next to each hill. When the vines are from twelve to twenty inches high, cut off all but three or four of the strongest shoots, preferably leaving ones that will make a well-balanced head. Tie these to the stake with soft twine or raffia. When the vines have begun to form fruit, remove superfluous lateral branches, so all the tomatoes will have plenty of light and air and ripen thoroughly and evenly. If exhibition fruits are wanted, pick off, when small, all except three or four fruits to a vine.

So many kinds of tomatoes are grown that it often is difficult for the amateur to make a selection. Bonny Best Early is a wonderfully early variety of fine quality. In the East it produces ripe fruit during late June, and continues to bear perfect specimens until late in August. The tomatoes are perfect in shape and ripen all over, even to the stem, and are an intense, glowing scarlet. Earliana is even earlier than Bonny Best. The different strains of this vary greatly in size and smoothness. Earliana's only real virtue is its earliness, as the fruit is tart and acid and the vines lack vigor. Chalk's Early Jewel, Stone, Matchless and Success are good later scarlet-fruited varieties for the home garden. June Pink is the ideal pink-fruited early sort. Globe and Ponderosa are well-known purple varieties. W. P. S.

NEW CATALOGUES

Peter Henderson & Company, as in other years, put out their large catalogue, Everything for the Garden, in most artistic and attractive form. Thousands of subjects pertaining to gardening in its every aspect are discussed and the most valuable hints and suggestions given for successful cultivation. Attention is called to several Henderson specialties. In the vegetable line may be mentioned the Henderson tomatoes, particularly the Ponderosa, which has a reputation from Maine to California; the early market cabbages; the snowball cauliflowers; the self-blanching celery, and the giant Spanish onions. Their flower seeds are justly famous and include every variety from roses of all kinds, lilies, chrysanthemums, dahlias, petunias, hollyhocks, peonies and pansies down to the delicate climbers which breathe their fragrance into our bedroom windows on summer mornings. The plant and bulb departments offer a fine range for selection. Peter Henderson & Co., 35-37 Cortlandt Street, New York. Pp. 200. Cover in color.

Burpee's Annual for 1913 is an encyclopedia of information about all kinds of seeds that can be sown or grown in farm and garden. Every effort is made to attain a degree as near perfection as possible. Seven thousand field trials are made annually on the Burpee farms, while there are more than fifteen thousand tests taken for soil vitality. The Fordhook farm in Pennsylvania comprises over two hundred acres of trial grounds, about fifteen of which are devoted to experiments in flowers and vegetables. The latest addition to the firm's properties is Florodale, situated in the Lompoc Valley, California. Illustrated, pp. 180. W. Atlee Burpee & Co., Philadelphia.

Thorburn's High Class Seeds is the title of the annual which comes from probably the oldest house in the business, that of J. M. Thorburn, 33 Barclay Street, New York. Over a century of experience means something in any business. It is a passport to the confidence of the public. Only the highest grades of seed are handled by this firm, and the testimonials from all over the country prove that the results justify all that is claimed. There are full and clear directions for the cultivation of vegetables, and also directions for making hotbeds. Information is given about lawns and the selection of grass seeds for different purposes. The book is fully illustrated. Pp. 160.

Allen's Catalogue, consisting of a list of the choicest strawberry plants and other small fruits, is issued by W. F. Allen, Salisbury, Md. Every variety of strawberry is listed, and practical suggestions given for their care and culture. The time to plant in different localities and the soil best adapted to the full growth and productive maturity of the plants are explained in a short and simple way. The book should prove very useful to growers in making a wise selection. Pp. 48. Illustrated.

Great Crops of Strawberries and How to Grow Them is the title of the R. M. Kellogg Company annual, into which is packed a great amount of up-to-date information about the strawberry, its care and cultivation. To growers of this favorite American plant the book is invaluable, as there is nothing omitted and everything included, from the first step in production and treatment of the crop until it reaches the market. Pp. 64. R. M. Kellogg Co., Three Rivers, Mich.

The Maule Seed Book, a large and handsome catalogue, is issued by William Henry Maule of Filbert Street, Philadelphia. In the 176 pages of this book is a variety of matter to interest not alone the horticulturist but all who have an eye for the beauty of plants and flowers. The first part of the book is devoted to the principal vegetables, all of which are well pictured. A section of the book relates to floriculture, which is also fully illustrated.

AMONG THE WORKERS

THE HAMILTON, OHIO, Daily News, writing of the revival work led by evangelists there, says: "People are deserting lives of wickedness by the thousands and turning to our churches. Personal workers by the hundred have pledged themselves to bring others into the kingdom. Dr. Biederwolf is gone, but the work he started in Hamilton goes on."

LOTTIE A. PIERCE, Omaha, Neb., writes thanking the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD who sent cards of greeting on the occasion of her father's eighty-eighth birthday anniversary. Nearly every State responded with greetings and good wishes, numbering nearly 1,700 letters. They came from north, south, east and west, and from many different bodies of Christians. He thanks all and prays that the peace of God may be yours as spoken in John 14: 27 and Phil. 4: 7.

EVANGELISTS HART AND MARANN, of Fairbury, Ill., recently conducted a most successful revival campaign at Sedalia, Mo. The Protestant churches united and erected a large tabernacle opposite the court house; the interest became so great before the close of the first week, it was necessary to extend the building. Great delegations from the high school, Commercial College and shops attended in a body on different nights. On labor night members of the union labor organizations, headed by the Sedalia brass band, marched to the building and filled the entire center section of seats. The meetings for men only brought out the largest audiences ever assembled in that city.

A Much Needed Book*

NOT often, upon opening a new and unheralded book, does one get as many and as pleasant surprises as await the reader who takes up for the first time Dr. Francis E. Clark's Old Homes of New Americans. We knew that Dr. Clark was a skilful writer on religious subjects and on travel. But as an expert sociologist he appears in a new light, and is as attractive here as in his other fields. Then, too, the name is a surprise. What does it mean—"Old Homes of New Americans"? It means, one discovers, the historic regions from which an ever increasingly large number of immigrants come to America, namely, the lands which form the complex Austro-Hungarian Empire.

Did you know, for instance, that the Slavic division alone of the empire consists of "Bohemians, Moravians, Croatians, Slovaks, Slovenians, Serbs, Poles and Ruthenians"? Did you know that Emperor Francis Joseph is king of Bohemia, Galicia and Dalmatia; the Margrave of Moravia and Istria; the Archduke of Upper Austria and Lower Austria; the Duke of Salzburg, Styria, Carinthia, Carniola, Silesia and the Bukowina; and the Prince of the Tyrol"? But it is about the people of these lands that the book tells, their homes, their achievements and splendors of the past, their high worth, their right to be welcomed with respect and real neighborliness, not with coarse jesting or equally cruel unconcern, when they come to try their fortunes in the new land of their dreams.

Dr. Clark's book is written throughout in the spirit of Mr. Schauffler's truly great poem, "Scum o' the Earth," which he reprints entire in his introduction. Dr. Clark suggests wisely: "It should be memorized in our schools, and it should be known by every lover of mankind, as well as by every true patriot." Most striking are the lines of the fourth division:

Man of the sorrow-bowed head,
Of the features tender yet strong,—
Man of the eyes full of wisdom and mystery,
Mingled with patience and dread?
Have I not known you in history,
Sorrow-bowed head?
Were you the poet-king, worth
Treasures of Ophir unpriced?
Were you the prophet, perchance, whose art
Foretold how the rabble would mock
That Shepherd of spirits, ere long,
Who should carry the lambs on his heart,
And tenderly feed his flock?
Man—lift that sorrow-bowed head.
Lo! 'tis the face of the Christ!

The vision dies at its birth.
You're merely a butt for our mirth.
You're a "Sheeny"—and therefore despised
And rejected as "scum o' the earth."

Special mention should be made of the book's sixteen delightful reproductions of photographic scenes.

RIPPLE WOVEN

RIPPLETTE

THE ROUGH-DRY FABRIC

For the Whole Family

NO IRONING

To the practical woman one of Ripplette's greatest attractions is that it requires no ironing, for the ripple is firmly woven into the fabric, giving a permanently crinkled surface that should not be ironed. You can keep yourself and the children delightfully spic and span all summer when you can cut out ironing trials and expense. Try Ripplette this season and even white dresses will cease to be an extravagance.

You'll find Ripplette in a variety of pure white patterns, both plain and corded, and in all desirable colors, both solid and in contrasting stripes.

Ripplette is pre-shrunk and fast colored, is 28 inches wide and costs 15 cents per yard.

Ripplette Bed Spreads are made in sizes to fit all beds, with plain hemmed and scalloped edges—both corner-cut and straight, they come in solid white and in striped effects in pink, blue, lavender, green, and yellow. They are very attractive and practical.

Ripplette spreads are inexpensive and suitable for all the year round use. They can be washed frequently because they are light in weight and need no ironing.

Important. Because of the genuine economic value of Ripplette many substitutes are on the market. There is only one Ripplette cloth and that is ours. If you buy a made-up garment don't accept it as genuine unless it has a Ripplette label inside.

If you cannot get Ripplette at your dealer's send us your name and address, and we will send you our book of samples, and tell you how you can get just what you want.

RACING THE STORM

From the Original Painting by Professor Schnars-Alquist

The "General" says:—"Coal tar is a by-product from gas works and coke ovens. It is driven out of the coal as a gas, t as the gas cools the tar is condensed into liquid form. Being of a gaseous origin, it dries out rapidly when exposed to the s and weather. Asphalt—the basis of Certain-teed Roofing is a blend of mineral asphalts and mineral asphalt oils taken out of earth. These asphalts were never a gas—they dry out very slowly. Nearly a quarter of a century of experience and tests h proved that these asphalts make an ideal and durable roof."

in Rolls and Shingles

Roofs don't wear out—they dry out

The only test of roofing is on the roof. It's absolutely impossible for any one—even an expert—to determine the quality or durability of roofing by simply looking at it, bending, tearing, smelling, heating or any other so-called "tests." Even a chemical analysis will throw little light on the question of durability.

The durability of the modern, easy-to-lay Certain-teed roll and shingle roofings, made of scientifically blended asphalt and felt, is remarkable.

You can now buy Ready Roofing with absolute quality assurance

No more guess work in buying Ready Roofing. Certain-teed Roofing is made of the highest grade weather and water proof asphalt—a roofing guaranteed for 15 years and will last much longer—backed by the largest maker of roofings and building papers in the world, with nearly a quarter of a century experience in mining and refining asphalt.

On the back of every roll and on every crate of shingles you will find the Certain-teed Label of Quality—a guarantee of durability.

A WEEKLY ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER FOR THE HOME

General Felix Diaz

The National Palace, Mexico City

The Late General Reyes

MADERO'S RULE IN MEXICO ENDS IN DISASTER

THOUGH Mexico's political sky has been far from clear of revolutionary clouds, it was almost as a bolt from the blue that the announcement came early this month that Mexico City had, over night, become an armed camp. The city had been expecting for a long time that a plot formed by the supporters of the old Diaz regime would come to fruition, and that the Madero administration would have to fight for its existence. Still the actual outbreak came as a surprise to even the best informed.

The leaders of this new revolution had not completed their plans, but were forced into action by the discovery of the plot and the moves made by the government for the arrest of some of the leaders. A hastily called secret meeting was held and immediate action decided upon. General Mondragon, one of the most trusted leaders under Porfirio Diaz, took the lead and despatched trusted men to direct the movements of the forces which were to strike the first blow. The government, being aware of these developments, rallied the remaining loyal troops during the night and placed rapid-fire guns in position to sweep the approaches to the national palace. Before morning the revolt was under way in several parts of the city.

General Felix Diaz and General Reyes were liberated early in the morning by cavalry cadets. They immediately took command and General Reyes led an attack on the national palace at 8:30 A.M. They were met by a fierce resistance and were forced to retire after the attack had been kept up for some time. As a result of this battle more than three hundred people were killed. Most of these are reported to have been non-combatants, for a large crowd, apparently unaware of the seriousness of the situation, gathered to watch the battle. Into this assemblage both sides fired, doing terrible execution. General Reyes was the most notable victim of the engagement. He fell, shot through the head, early in the assault.

Rioting followed during the day and a number of the newspaper offices were attacked. General Diaz did not interfere with the federal mounted police who were keeping order in the streets, but despatched the larger part of his troops to capture the arsenal. At noon the defenders of this building surrendered and all the military stores fell into the hands of the revolutionary leaders. During the afternoon there were a number of small fights in different parts of the city, though the rioting had been practically quelled. One of the first reports from Mexico City drew particular attention to the fact that the populace seemed very little interested in the revolution and were spectators rather than participants.

Late that evening General Diaz sent the following message to the American people through one of the great New York daily papers. "The revolt is in progress and in a few hours will have to be decided. All the chances are in our favor. I will protect all your citizens and properties. (Signed) FELIX DIAZ."

Next morning the federal troops still held their positions and throughout the night had strengthened their defenses at the national palace by the erection of barricades and the addition of large stores of ammunition.

Francisco I. Madero, Ex-President of Mexico

All the despatches of the five following days told the same story of continuous fighting. The engagements started with heavy cannonading each morning and lasted intermittently until late afternoon. By both the government forces and the revolutionists, heavy artillery and machine guns were used with great precision. The fighting practically all took place in the most important parts of the ancient capital. The first rush was toward the Zocalo or open plaza before the national palace, but after that it centered in the western section, where practically all the modern buildings are located and where European and American influence is the strongest. The 10th, 11th and 12th of February were occupied by a long artillery duel in which many of the finest of the buildings of the city were badly damaged. The Mutual Life Insurance Building, in which American capital was largely interested, was wrecked by exploding shells and set on fire. The American consulate was several times under fire and was badly damaged. Shells broke in the American Club, but fortunately no one was killed. The roofs of all the highest buildings were made vantage points for the machine guns and sharpshooters of the opposing forces. This drew upon them a hail of shrapnel which did terrible execution. The roof of the Y. M. C. A. building was reported almost demolished by this fire.

On the last day of the fighting the government proposed to place cannon in the American embassy for the purpose of shelling the arsenal. But as many Americans and other foreigners had gathered there for safety from the bombardment, Ambassador Wilson, our government's representative, absolutely refused to allow this or to accept Madero's suggestion that the American refugees be removed to some other point. When the guns were posted in that vicinity it was only the strong fear of bringing immediate intervention by some outside power that led General Diaz to refrain from replying from the arsenal. Throughout the entire course of this strange battle, the representatives of the foreign powers exerted their utmost influence to secure a cessation of hostilities and to have the opposing political factions arbitrate their differences. President Madero absolutely refused to consider such a proposition and was supported in this decision by a number of his generals and civil advisers. On the morning of February 14, however, it was decided that a continuation of the great artillery duel would only bring down upon Mexico the condemnation of all the world. Both sides seemed to realize this, and when negotiations for peace were undertaken by Señor Francisco de la Barra he was well received by both parties. The British and Spanish representatives worked heartily with Señor de la Barra, calling in company with him on both Madero and Diaz. The latest despatches state that President Madero has been led to see the wisdom of resignation, and that in all probability Señor de la Barra will be appointed provisional president until the real desire and will of the people of Mexico can be ascertained.

ETERNAL LIFE

A SERMON

TEXT: "Fight the good fight of faith, lay hold on eternal life." I Tim. 6: 12

By
Rev. H. P. Lyman-Wheaton, D.D.*

SKIN for skin, all that a man hath will he give for his life." The miser lives only in his gold; yet surely, if it should come to such a pass, he would let his gold go. If we could know all the secret history of the people amongst whom we dwell, or even in our own narrow circle, we should find some burdened to the last extremity of endurance, with a life-long wrestle with the most abject poverty; some weighed with a load of cares of many kinds, diseases, disappointments, trials without number; and yet, what a small percentage of these it is that are driven to suicide, and even of these, how many lose their reason first! Is not our own life, and that of those we love, the most precious thing we have? If it is ever in danger, we do not think of cost. Would we not sell all that we have to buy life? One would think then that the offer of eternal life would be one with which the world would close with the utmost earnestness, and be only too glad to obtain it at any cost; that such things as persuasion, appeal, entreaty, argument, would have no place here! Surely, the herald of such tidings will be everywhere welcome! Men will gather about him in throngs, and press him for the terms on which they may be possessed of the boon. He will be hailed as the prince of benefactors, honored above all other men! The young man, in the glory of his strength and fulness of his ardor; and the young woman in the prime of life's sweet blossoming time, when life is all beauty and fragrance —how eagerly will they hang upon the lips of the preacher, as he tells of the blessedness of eternal life, and points to the divine way! Nor will the busy ones, in the midst of life's pressing duties, and in the thick of its responsibilities, grudge time spent in hearing again and again, though it be in the same words, of this grandest gift of God! Whilst the aged, who are tottering to the grave, and feeling that the brightness of the world is beginning to fade, and the sun to lose its glory and its zest, and the music of life to grow faint and dim—they too will surely welcome the tidings of eternal life, as a great and priceless gift.

Strange Indifference

Is it so? Is not the fact in most melancholy contrast to this pleasing picture? To the young and gay, is not the preacher's voice for the most part an unpleasant one? To the man of business, is it not too often an unmeaning voice, heard, but not perceived, as one hears the ticking of the clock while one reads an absorbing tale? Do not men embrace every excuse for not going to hear it that their conscience will tolerate? As we tell you of this mighty gift, and how it is to be had, and try to enhance its worth, do we never see the sleeper lost in its oblivion, or the careless out on their thought-journey to the ends of the earth, or the ledger lying with the Bible on the shelf?

This is strange if you think about it. Of many thousand preachers who are preaching every week this is the burden of their discourse—Eternal Life! All leads up to this in order that men may "be saved"—saved from missing this glorious end of their being, which God himself has offered and given us at the cost of an unspeakable price. They are telling of a thing that is more precious to every sort of man than any other thing, and the thing for which men will part with everything else. And they are all telling of it in its perfection. Of a life for which there is no death, and no end! Of a life not marred, as this is, by imperfection, and trouble, and sorrow, and pain, and a thousand nameless ills. And they are offering this great gift without money and without price! Not without terms, but upon terms which are consistent with the highest human happiness, and with the truest and noblest human life. And yet thousands do not listen; and of the thousands who do, the hearing is, in many cases, a listless, profitless, resultless thing.

"Lay hold on eternal life." Eternal life must be to be had, then. I wonder how many of us have ever seriously thought of it! "Of course it is." Ah, that "of course"! "There's a mine of diamonds to be had if you will sell what you have and buy the next field!" The world does not meekly say "Of course," and plod on its accustomed way, in such a case. No! It opens eyes, and ears, and brain, and heart, and says, in an eager tone, "What! Do you mean it? Is it true?" and on receiving the necessary proof instantly begins to cast about for the means of so enriching itself. But when one says, in the midst of dying, sorrowing men, "Eternal life is to be had," all the reply their spirit gives us is "Of course." Think of it now. "I may live forever and ever! I may conquer death, may pass through it as a victor; bow down at its thrust, only to rise up again and laugh at its impotence; may bare my breast to its dart, only to bound up to life again, and shout joyously, "O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?"

The Meaning of Life

I may not only possess life a second time, but such a life as shall make this seventy years of song and sunshine, sighs and shade, a mere episode, which by comparison with the surroundings of the new life shall be but as darkness. I may spurn this hindering, cramping, fettering body of sin and death away from me, and in some finer, more ethereal shape rise beyond, upward, to a realm of pure, stronger life, to find all things revealed in new and brightened splendor; to find life, and love, and work, and worship grander and diviner things; to look back upon pain as we now look back on some troublous dream of the night that is passed away; upon all life's tears, as we think in our manhood of the sorrows of our childhood and youth; upon all the struggles and strifes and woes of these fleeting years as we look, from the ripe competency of our manhood, upon the apprenticeship through which we passed to what we are now. Ah, more than all, I may hope to wake up from the lifelong trace, purged of this body of sin and death, with how much of the Christ likeness upon me, and how much more of God in all the universe; to join in songs, compared with which our sweetest harmonies here are but the lisping of babes; in a worship as spontaneous and happy as the song of childhood on the gay morning of spring! Crowd together all that makes life happy now; leave out all that makes it other than bliss to live; then purify it of all grossness; then magnify and multiply it all a myriad times, and you will see as through a glass, darkly, some faint, shadowy image of the thing that may be the portion of all—eternal life! We pay a huge price, some of us, for these seventy years. The lenses through which most of us look at this universe are very dim; our range of vision leaves so much to be seen and so little to see with; such grand work to do, and such incapacity to do that much. What is the sky, to most of us, but a candle to work by? What, to most men, is the earth but a workshop, or a field to plow? Or the past, but a lesson to spell out with much toilsome pains? And if to some of us it be more—a temple, a liturgy, a psalm—what is all our worship in it, even measured by our own inspiration, but as the flapping of the wings of some poor wounded eagle that would, but somehow cannot, soar up to the sun? Those of us who get the most out of this life —what is the worth of what we get, if it be not seed? What will be the end of all our toil, if the discipline and education it brings is to have no after-scope? If it be true that there is eternal life possible to every one of us if we will lay hold on it, then we can understand it all—all these trials, these sorrows, this price we pay for life, and joy, and growth, and competency. If this life of seventy years be the process by which we develop into, and up to, the divine, then it is undeniably beautiful; otherwise, human life is the darkest of problems.

Salvation Through Jesus Christ

But eternal life is to be had—if not, what means the grand mystery, the life and death of our Lord who said: "I am come that they might have life"? Here is Jesus Christ seeming to say to us all: "That is the life which is eternal—this life of mine; this life unto God; this constant endeavor to do the Father's will; this complete surrender to that perfect will; this daily, hourly losing of the self-life in other lives; this faithfulness to the highest things in us and about us; this making the flesh subservient to the spirit, and worldly ambition give way to the divine; this meek acceptance of toil and strife, for the sake of what it brings to the soul-life; this zeal for the highest alone; this grand subjugation of the whole secular and sensual, with all endeavors to obtain the mastery over us, that may find in our own spirits something infinite grander than all that it can give."

This, then, is the message of that Saviour w came to earth "to bring life and immortality light"—to teach men how they might begin now live the life everlasting, and who set up his kin dom in the hearts of men. He himself showed the way from death to life. He dies and becom a tenant of the tomb that he may rise glo ously, and leave the light of his path evermore vi ble to mortal eyes. Nor is this all. If the voi which preceded and which followed that death, a which seems to refer to it, has been rightly unde stood by us, it gives us assurance of pardon, r demption and ransom through God's love incarnat that it may be a power with us, a reconciling powe a sanctifying power, a saving power. But to wh extent? Is it only that it may save me from m sensual self, my ambitious self, my lower self f these seventy years, and then let me drop into not ing? Is it only that God may have my songs a prayers, for this little instant of his eternity, a then let my tongue and heart rot in the dust? Is only that I may develop the highest and the inwa part of me, and so live the highest and best of liv possible to man; and then, just as I am most pe fectly developed, be snuffed out, as a thing of n more use and no more value than the dust which enrich; the very soil of the earth of more wort than I, by so much as I help to fatten it; the rock older and more permanent than I, and mocking th brevity of my existence?

The Choice Is Ours

But oh, let me tell it you again. You are not t wait for it to happen to you: you are to begin t possess; the action must be yours, your thought your choice, your resolve!

But oh, as I see some of you, it looks like a hope less task—your hands are full! I see one of yo grasping a golden goblet with both hands; and see by the way in which you hold it that it will b very hard work for you to put it resolutely down away out of reach. It is full of sparkling nectar and for it you will have already parted with n little of your highest self. What would life be t me without this? you say. Ah, my brother, he wh would lay hold on eternal life must have empty hands; must empty them himself; ay, for the tim being, of anything he may hold. You must be will ing to give up every kind of pleasure that you shal find incompatible with eternal life; and you must prove it by putting that cup away—earnestly away

And I see another, with his hands full of bags o gold, and they are not full yet; twice already he ha filled them, and has enlarged their capacity, and h is very busy filling them again. But I want to-day for your sake, my brother, the empty hand! You cannot lay hold on eternal life with those bags of gold in your hands! I do not say the business of this world must be forsworn—Jesus himself did not pray that his followers should be taken out of the world, but that they might be kept from the evils of the world. Eternal life must be the chief thing with you, if you are to possess it; and you will have to put these bags of gold resolutely down for a while, and not think of them till you have laid hold upon it; and then you must take them up again, to use them henceforth only under the control of the interest of the life eternal.

I see yet one more hand, locked so tightly, tenderly, in another's hand, with the sweet grasp of true, right, honest love. I want the empty hand to-day. I do not say you must forswear love if you are to possess eternal love—far from it; but for a while the empty hand. Even that grasp must be relinquished, that passion overpowered, that absorbing interest be itself absorbed and overborne by a stronger interest and passion, and God must have all your heart if you are to lay hold on eternal life. You shall come back again, indeed, and feel that tender grasp again; but it shall be even a more sweet and tender and blessed thing when you know yourself to be the possessor of eternal life.

When we thus meet the conditions and thus accept the efficacy of Christ's blood we may claim the glad "promise that he hath promised us, even eternal life."

"BACHELORS OF TIMIDITY"?

BY ARTHUR H. HOWLAND

A FRIEND whom I see frequently on the train has a very amusing, cheerful and optimistic view of life. He is something of a fault-finder, but he always finds fault with a rare sort of twinkle in his eye and a contagious smile on his lips, so that it is rather hard to scold him for his scolding. But about himself and about life in general, he is delightfully cheerful. Nothing worries him; he is successful; he has made his own success, and feels that he can make just about as much more success as he determines to go after. The things he has set out to do he has done. In his own words:

"Anything I want to push over I push over."

Yet he does not say it boastfully. It is with a good-humored sort of gratitude. He thinks other men could do about the same thing if they would make up their minds to do it.

But something he said the other night surprised me more than ordinarily:

"I never worry," he said. "It's only the educated man that worries. The uneducated man doesn't know enough to worry."

That was startling. I pressed him for explanation.

WHY, yes," he assured me, "the educated man sees too much. He sees everything that might happen and get scared. He thinks the chances against him are too big, so he gives up. The uneducated man doesn't see those things that might happen, and while the other man is figuring it out he goes in and gets it done."

That reminded me of one of my father's stories, which I forthwith told. It was about a general who wanted a bridge built in a hurry. Before he saw the proper engineering officer he happened upon the regiment's "handy man," who always knew how to do the right thing quick. The general told him the bridge must be built, and built in a hurry.

"I'll see the engineer," he added, "and he will send you the necessary blue prints."

The next day the general met the handy man again.

"How are you getting along with the bridge?" he asked.

"Oh, the bridge is built, sir," the man replied, "but I haven't got the pictures yet."

NOW, how about all this? Of course, the important thing is to get the bridges built, whether the pictures come along or not. But is it true that the educated man—by that I suppose my friend meant the college-trained man—is too slow or too timid, and so lets the others slip ahead?

"An educated man can't succeed as a contractor," my friend went on. "Take those regulation Irish contractors. They don't sit down and figure things out. They jump at it. They see at a glance about how much the thing will cost. I knew one, for instance, who, when some one wanted him to bid on a building, would get the prospective owner to ride around the streets with him.

"'Does it look like that wan?' he would ask, pointing to a building.

"'Yes, something like that.'

"'How many stories dh'ye say it'll have?'

"'Eight.'

"Pat remembers he built one about that size last month for eighty thousand dollars. This one is to be slightly smaller.

"'I'll do it for sivinty-sivin thousand,' he says.

"'Done,' says the owner. And it's all over but driving the nails."

BUT is not my friend mistaken, as a matter of fact, as to the way most successful contracting is done? There are doubtless many contractors who succeed in this offhand, haphazard fashion, but it could probably not be demonstrated that the majority of successful contractors win their success by any other process than the ancient, honorable and laborious method of "counting the cost." The successful contractor keeps track of the market prices, knows how many men, working how many hours, can produce a certain amount of work. Inspiration and daring are not enough. He must have information as well. One of the most fascinating men in New York is a traffic specialist, who has worked out an amazingly comprehensive and intricate system of finding out how many trains, of how many cars, running at what headway, will be required to serve a certain section of any city. He figures out the population, he figures out what percentage travel, and where they travel, and when they travel. Then he will tell you how many trains you need, of how many cars, and how often they must run; how much it will all cost, and how much it will pay. But he does not guess at it; he does not reach it by intuition. He figures it out, and he is a graduate of Cornell.

THE whole question of going or not going to college is too big to discuss in the limits of this space. Nor is there space to consider the propositions advanced and the experiments already made for changing the college curriculum. Mr. Johnson's book, Stover at Yale, in which he holds that the ordinary American college is "an institution for the prevention of learning," has been vigorously attacked and to a considerable extent discredited, though it will doubtless do some good as a stimulus and a challenge.

MY GENIAL friend has made, by his objection and accusation, a distinct contribution to the discussion. For the accusation becomes a positive bit of advice. Is it true that the ordinary college education has a tendency to make a man timid and to make him slow? If it does have any such tendency it ought to be changed. And it is being changed. Education should make a man cautious, but it should also make him fearless. The football enthusiast will have a word to say here about the benefits of his specialty. To sum up, a real education should train a man to do his own thinking, to do it bravely, to do it quickly—and, of course (the one thing for which education has always stood), to do it correctly.

HER FATHER

WHERE is the tiny little girl
Who used to sit on my knee?
That cried when she broke her dolly,
And told her secrets to me?
That dug all day in the sandbox,
And, worn out after her play,
Fell asleep with her head on my shoulder?
Can it be she has gone away?

As she grew in her youth and her beauty,
And at last laid the toys aside,
I was sorry, and yet there was something
That seemed to add to my pride.
For the house rang with music and laughter,
And the voices of playmates gay;
And I never thought of the morrow,
Of the time she would go away!

Yes, the wedding at last is over,
And the thrown rice litters the floor;
But I sigh as I think of the kiss she threw
As she turned when she reached the door.
How sweet she looked in her garments white,
As her voice so happy and low
Said good-by to me with the soft-lipped smile
Of the baby of long ago!

Memorizing Bible Verses

FIVE years ago, an American woman spending some months in Birmingham, England, started a movement for learning a verse of Scripture each day. It is called the "Bible Success Band," and is founded on Joshua 1: 8, where "good success" is promised to those who meditate on God's Word and observe its precepts. The movement found such favor among ministers, missionaries and Christian workers that it has now been started in England and America, in China, Japan and Korea, and in Australia, New Zealand and South America.

Scarcely anything helps one more vitally in the Christian life than committing God's Word to memory. John Ruskin said: "Everything that I have written, every greatness that there has been in any thought of mine, whatever I have done in my life, has been simply due to the fact that when I was a child my mother daily read with me a part of the Bible, and daily made me learn a part of it by heart." Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman says: "A verse of Scripture committed to memory in the morning goes singing its way like a song through the soul all the day long."

From those at home and abroad come glowing testimonies of the blessing received from learning a verse of Scripture daily. Mr. W. J. Tunley of Brisbane, Australia, secretary of the Queensland Evangelization Society, says: "The Bible Success Band is one of the grandest things I know. For three years my wife and I and three children have followed the plan. Our children learn the verses at family prayers in the morning, and review them after tea in the evening. They have learned the verses without mental strain and have greatly enjoyed it. They could stand up and recite Scripture for an hour or two." A handsome little booklet has just been issued by the band containing the list of verses to be memorized during the year 1913.

UNCLE SAM'S BABY BUREAU

BY LEWIS MERIAM

Assistant Chief of the United States Children's Bureau

THE United States Children's Bureau is in two senses the Government's Baby Bureau. In the first place it is the youngest of the numerous Bureaus at Washington, having been created by an act of Congress approved April 9, 1912; and, moreover, it did not begin active operations until the passage of the great Legislative, Executive and Judicial Appropriation Bill on August 23, 1912. It is thus almost brand new. In the second place it is charged with the duty of investigating all matters pertaining to the welfare of the children of our country; that is, it is to work for the welfare of the babies and the babies' older brothers and sisters. In this sense it will always be the Babies' Bureau.

The task mapped out for the bureau, with its little force of fifteen persons, and its appropriation of only approximately $30,000, is little short of stupendous—to investigate and report upon all matters pertaining to the welfare of children, when the country has over two million little babies under one year old, and when almost one-third of our population is made up of children less than fifteen years old. The welfare of these children, too, must depend in a large measure on the care and protection extended to them by the remaining two-thirds of our population, and thus the work of the bureau will ultimately bring it close to the whole people.

Fortunately for those who had to determine in what part of the great field the bureau should begin its work, Congress specified certain subjects for especial investigation; namely, infant mortality, the birth rate, orphanage, juvenile courts, desertion, dangerous occupations, accidents and diseases of children, employment, and legislation affecting children in the several States and Territories.

The first task for the new bureau, after perfecting its organization, was, obviously, to begin to bring together the existing material on these subjects, so that it may have, as a guide in its work, the experience of others, and so that it may be in a position to supply to those who turn to it for information the best that is available. The first step, therefore, was to secure a librarian reader and translator, who would know not only the routine of library administration, but also the great streams of current literature, and be able to draw from them the latest word regarding children, and, if necessary, translate it from foreign languages. This work will, of necessity, take much time, and it will never be finished, but it is progressing satisfactorily, and already the bureau is receiving reports regarding the work being done for children in all sections of the country, and, one might even say, in all parts of the world.

In the past, much statistical material relating to children has been published by various government bureaus, especially the Bureau of the Census and the Bureau of Labor, but this material has never been brought together and correlated by any one interested primarily in its relation to the problems of child welfare. This work will be begun at once, and the results of it will be published in a statistical handbook. As it will be necessary to delay certain parts of it until the latest census figures are available, the bureau may decide to issue it in sections, each section being a statistical study of the available official data pertaining to some one of the problems of child welfare.

The bureau will also publish from time to time brief popular monographs on different subjects of current interest. For example, it has just issued a pamphlet setting forth the necessity of adequate birth registration.

But not all the work of the bureau, even in its first year, will be based on material already collected. The law provides for two special agents, and they will, from the outset, be employed in original field investigations.

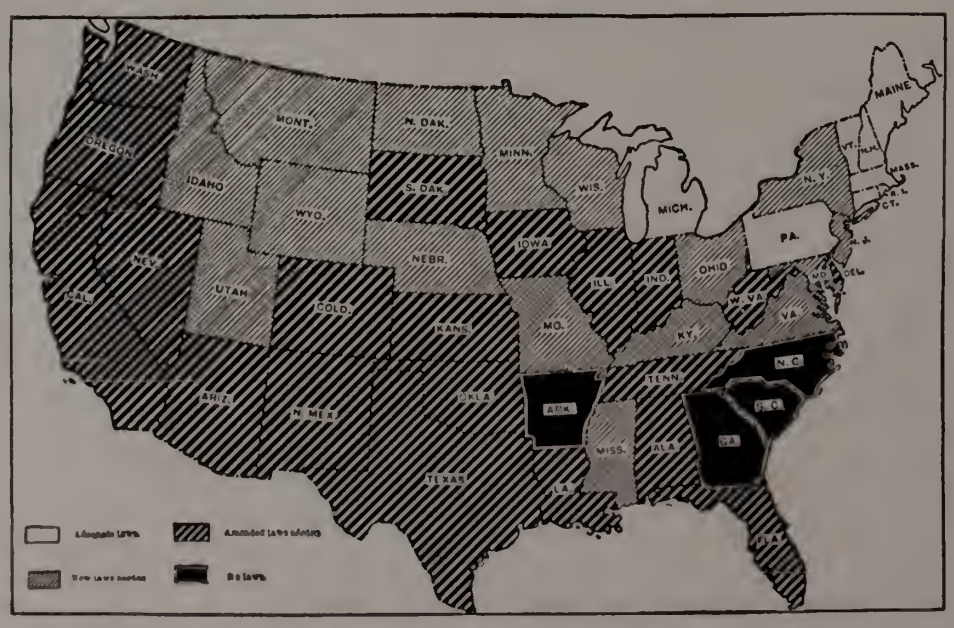
The selection of the first subject for investigation from among the numerous subjects within the scope of the bureau was, of course, a matter for considerable discussion, and the surprising thing was the unanimity with which it was decided to take up the first subject specified by the law, infant mortality, or the death of babies in the first year of life.

Miss Julia C. Lathrop
Chief of the Children's Bureau

In this country our records of deaths are very defective. Only 63.1 per cent. of our population live in places where the law requires deaths to be registered, but estimates based on the returns from the places where deaths are registered show that at the present time we are probably losing each year at least 300,000 babies under one year old. In the ten years from 1901 to 1910 we probably lost over 2,500,000. Two and a half million in ten years is a pretty hard figure to understand. It is as if the entire city of Chicago were wiped out of existence once every ten years, not a soul being saved. Three hundred thousand a year means an average of over eight hundred a day. We can easily imagine the feeling of horror which would sweep over us if we should pick up a morning paper and read of some catastrophe which had wiped out 800 human lives in a single day. We should probably have a feeling of righteous indignation if this article had told us further that at least half of these deaths could have been prevented if simple methods of saving lives, well known to the more intelligent members of the community, had be applied, but were not because of neglect or ignc ance. Yet this is precisely what we are told l experts regarding our infant mortality—that least one-half of the babies who now die could l saved if the methods already known could l brought into general use.

Some people, knowing of this great loss of bi bies, have, in the past, advocated taking no steps t prevent it on the ground that it is a wise dispensa tion of nature, intended to prevent children with weak constitution from becoming too numerou but as the report on the International Congress o the Prevention of Infant Mortality, prepared un der the supervision of Profesor Dietrich of Berli has pointed out: "To-day we know that a grea infant mortality is a great national disaster—o the one hand because numerous economic value are created without purpose and prematurely de stroyed; and on the other because the causes of th high rate of infant mortality affect the power o resistance of the other infants and weaken th strength of the nation in its next generation." Dr J. W. Schereschewsky, of the United States Public Health Service, puts it this way: "A necessary sequence to a high infant mortality rate is the larger number of children who, having weathered the storms of the first year, reach the haven of comparative safety of the other years of life in a battered, weakened and crippled condition, such as forever handicaps them in becoming efficient social units. It is therefore in the nature of an axiom that, in the degree to which the infant mortality rate is lowered, to a far greater degree will we diminish the great army of defective and degenerate children among us." The question of whether a given baby will survive is at present probably determined less by the physical condition of that baby at the time of its birth than by the degree of intelligence and conscientiousness exercised in its care.

As infant mortality affects the very life of children, it seemed to all concerned with the work of the bureau that it was fundamental and ought to be the very first subject taken up by the new bureau. In order to study it intelligently, one must know not only how many babies die under given conditions, but also how many babies survive under those same conditions. Possibly this will be a little plainer if we make up some figures to illustrate the point. Suppose, in our imaginary town, we found that two hundred babies had died in a year, and of this number one-half were breast-fed, and the other half bottle-fed. It might be argued from such figures that either method of feeding was equally safe; but such an argument would be absolutely erroneous, for the number of babies who had been breast-fed and had survived would in all probability be markedly higher than the number of babies who had been bottle-fed and survived. To imagine figures again, possibly 1,000 babies might have been breast-fed, and of these 100 died, giving us a death rate of one in ten for breast-fed babies, whereas possibly 500 babies might have been bottle-fed, and of these 100 died, giving us a death rate of one in five. These figures are, of course, imaginary, and are only used to illustrate the necessity of getting facts for the babies who live as well as those for the babies who die.



A Birth-Registration Map of the United States

With this point in mind, we decided that in our investigation, which is to study the feeding and care of babies, the economic position of their parents, and the hygienic and sanitary conditions under which they live or die, we must get returns for all the babies born in the selected community in a given year and follow them through their first year of life. Our method is to send our agents into the field selected and have them copy from the birth records the names and addresses of all the babies born in the given year. Then they visit the homes in which the babies were born and talk with the mothers, who are, as a little preliminary work done here in Washington showed, more than willing to help, so far as they are able, in a work designed to prevent the unnecessary loss of babies' lives. DEATH WIPES OUT BRAVE EXPLORERS

CAPTAIN ROBERT F. SCOTT, R.N., REACHES SOUTH POLE ONLY TO PERISH WITH FOUR COMPANIONS IN ANTARCTIC BLIZZARD. HIS LAST MESSAGE TO THE WORLD

he Late Captain Robert Falcon Scott, R.N

HORRIBLE, horrible! I can hardly believe it. There must be some awful mistake." These were the words of Captain Roald Amundsen when he was told that Captain Robert Falcon Scott of the British Navy and all his party had perished in the wilds about the South Pole.

On February 10 a New York morning newspaper printed a little despatch from New Zealand saying Captain Scott's ship, the Terra Nova, had been sighted, and adding the hope that it might give its readers the full story in the next day's paper. Then at noon the thrill of a great disaster raced over the cables, bringing the terrible report that the heroic leader and sixty-five men had perished. All London seemed to catch its breath in one mighty sob. Never since the death of England's much loved king, Edward VII, had there been such universal sorrow and gloom. The meager reports that came through the rest of the day were eagerly read. Then on the morning of the eleventh came the accurate news telling of the heroic deaths of five explorers, and giving Captain Scott's last message to his country. Then all Britain's grief was mingled with pride, for the world rose up to call one more Englishman a hero and to join with Rear Admiral Peary in saying, "Splendid in death as in life." By the following morning the details of the disaster had sped round the world and Scott's epic farewell had thrilled the heart of the Anglo-Saxon race.

In the dark and awful cold of a little tent, with two dying companions, the explorer wrote his message:*

"The causes of this disaster are not due to faulty organization, but to misfortune in all the risks which had to be undertaken. One, the loss of pony transport in March, 1911, obliged me to start later than I had intended, and obliged the limits of stuff transported to be narrowed. The weather throughout the outward journey, and especially the long gale in 83 degrees south, stopped us. The soft snow in the lower reaches of the glacier again reduced the pace.

"We fought these untoward events with will and conquered, but it ate into our provision reserve. Every detail of our food supplies, clothing and depots made on the interior ice-sheet and on that long stretch of 700 miles to the pole and back worked out to perfection. The advance party would have returned to the glacier in fine form and with a surplus of food but for the astonishing failure of the man whom we had least expected to fail. Seaman Edgar Evans was thought to be the strongest man of the party, and Beardmore glacier is not difficult in fine weather. But on our return we did not get a single completely fine day. This, with a sick companion, enormously increased our anxieties. I have said elsewhere that we got into frightfully rough ice, and Edgar Evans received a concussion of the brain. He died a natural death, but left us a shaken party, with the season unduly advanced.

"But all the facts above enumerated were as nothing to the surprise which awaited us at the Barrier. I maintain that our arrangements for returning were quite adequate, and that no one in the world would have done better in the weather which we encountered at this time of the year. On the summit, in latitude 85 degrees to 86 degrees, we had minus twenty to minus thirty. On the Barrier, in latitude 82 degrees, 10,000 feet lower, we had minus thirty in the day and minus forty-seven at night pretty regularly, with a continuous headwind during our day marches.

"These circumstances came on very suddenly, and our wreck is certainly due to this sudden advent of severe weather, which does not seem to have any satisfactory cause.

"I do not think human beings ever came through such a month as we have come through, and we should have got through in spite of the weather but for the sickening of a second companion, Captain Oates, and a shortage of fuel in our depots, for which I cannot account, and, finally, but for the storm which has fallen on us within eleven miles of the depot at which we hoped to secure the final supplies. Surely misfortune could scarcely have exceeded this last blow!

"We arrived within eleven miles of our old One Ton Camp with fuel for one hot meal and food for two days. For four days we have been unable to leave the tent, the gale blowing about us. We are weak.

"Writing is difficult, but for my own sake I do not regret this journey, which has shown that Englishmen can endure hardships, help one another, and meet death with as great a fortitude as ever in the past. We took risks. We knew we took them. Things have come out against us, and therefore we have no cause for complaint, but bow to the will of Providence, determined still to do our best to the last.

"But if we have been willing to give our lives to this enterprise, which is for the honor of our country, I appeal to our countrymen to see that those who depend on us are properly cared for. Had we lived, I should have had a tale to tell of the hardihood, endurance, and courage of my companions, which would have stirred the heart of every Englishman.

"These rough notes and our dead bodies must tell the tale, but surely, surely a great, rich country like ours will see that those who are dependent on us are properly provided for.

"March 25, 1912. (Signed) R. SCOTT."

The dead, besides Captain Scott, are Dr. E. A. Wilson, chief of the scientific staff, zoologist and artist; Lieutenant H. R. Bowers, of the Royal Indian Marines; Captain L. E. G. Oates, of the Inniskillen Dragoons, in charge of ponies and dogs, and Petty Officer E. Evans. Captain Scott, Dr. Wilson and Lieutenant Bowers died together in their tent, eleven miles from One Ton depot, where food and shelter awaited them, could they have but reached it through the blizzard. Their bodies were found in the tent. Petty Officer Evans, injured by a fall in which he suffered concussion of the brain, had died some days before. Captain Oates, his feet and hands frostbitten, struggled on with the party until he realized that he was hindering the others.

The Antarctic Ship Terra Nova

Commander E. R. G. R. Evans, R.N., has given out a detailed account of the tragedy. It is in the main as follows:

Captain Robert F. Scott's antarctic ship, the Terra Nova, on January 18, this year, arrived at Cape Evans, the base on McMurdo Sound, where it was to meet the explorers on their return from the expedition in search of the South Pole, and bring them back, if they were ready. It was learned from the shore party found at this base that Captain Scott and the four men with him had reached the pole on January 18, 1912, but all had perished on the return journey, about the end of March. Their bodies were not found until a searching party discovered them on November 12, nearly eight months after the disaster.

Mrs. Scott and Peter, the Explorer's Son

Captain Scott, Dr. Edward A. Wilson, chief of the scientific staff, and Lieutenant H. R. Bowers had made their way back to within 155 miles of Cape Evans, when they were caught in a blizzard and were overcome about March 29. They were then within eleven miles of One Ton depot, where they would have found shelter and supplies. Previously Petty Officer Edgar Evans and Captain L. E. G. Oates of the Inniskillen Dragoons, who had been in charge of the ponies and dogs, had succumbed. Evans was the first to give way, dying from concussion of the brain due to a fall on February 17. Oates died from exposure on March 17.

The records of Captain Scott were recovered by a relief expedition. They showed that he and his party had reached the South Pole on January 18, 1912. There they found the tent and records left by Captain Roald Amundsen when he quit the pole on December 17, 1911.

The search party left Cape Evans after the winter on October 30 last. The party, which was organized by Surgeon Atkinson, consisted of two divisions, Atkinson taking the dog teams with Garrard and Demetri, and Mr. Wright being in charge of a party including Nelson, Gran, Lashley, Crean, Williamson, Keohane, and Hooper, with seven Indian mules. They were provisioned for three months, as they expected an extended search. One Ton Camp was found in order, and all provisioned. Proceeding along the old southern route, Wright's party sighted Captain Scott's tent on November 12. Within it were found the bodies of Captain Scott, Dr. Wilson, and Lieutenant Bowers. They had saved their records, hard pressed as they were.

From these papers the following information was gleaned: The first death was that of Seaman Edgar Evans, petty officer of the Royal Navy, official number 160,225, who died on February 17 at the foot of the Beardmore Glacier. His death was accelerated by a concussion of the brain sustained while traveling over the rough ice some time before.

Captain L. E. G. Oates of the Sixth Inniskillen Dragoons was the next lost. His feet and hands had been badly frostbitten from exposure on the march. Although he struggled on heroically, on March 16 his comrades knew that his end was approaching. He had borne his intense sufferings for weeks without complaint, and he did not give up hope to the very end. Captain Scott wrote in his diary this tribute to Captain Oates: "He was a brave soul. He slept through the night, hoping not to wake, but he awoke in the morning. It was blowing a blizzard. Oates said: 'I am just going outside and may be some time.' He went out into the blizzard and we have not seen him since. We knew that Oates was walking to his death, but, though we tried to dissuade him, we knew it was the act of a brave man and an English gentleman."

On March 16 Oates was really unable to travel, but the others could not leave him and he would not hold them back. After his gallant death, Scott, Wilson and Bowers pushed on northward when the abnormally bad weather would permit them to proceed. They were forced to camp on March 1, eleven miles south of the big depot at One Ton Camp. This refuge they never reached, owing to a blizzard, which is known to have lasted nine days, overtaking them. Their food and fuel gave out and they succumbed to exposure.

The Antarctic Tragedy

IN THE whole history of polar exploration, filled as it is with the record of suffering and death, there is no sadder story than that of Captain Robert F. Scott and his four companions of the British Antarctic Expedition, who perished after they had reached the goal. Their courage and endurance in the face of the long polar blizzard, the sickening of the heroic adventurers one by one, and the final scene in the tent, where they lay stormbound and dying, all tell of a tragedy whose details can better be imagined than described. Captain Scott's farewell letter reveals a courage on the part of the little group of doomed explorers that thrills the heart. They met death like true heroes. They had played the game, and although they had missed the prize by a single month, they were victors still. Not England alone but the whole world will honor these men who calmly laid down their lives in the cause of science and for the glory of their native land.

But while the results of their efforts and the complete records of their successful march southward have been saved to the world, there are many who will ask whether all such achievements are not won at too dear a price. Both poles have now been reached. Every adventure has been marked by awful suffering and not a few by loss of life. For nearly two centuries the lanes of polar exploration have been dotted by the graves of martyrs to science. There were dead in Bering's crew in 1725, and again on his second voyage in 1741, when he himself perished. Sir John Franklin and twenty-three men with him died among the ice in 1848. Captain Hall found a grave in the Arctic in 1871. Commander DeLong lost twenty men in the floes and hummocks of the Lena Delta in 1881. Five members of Lieutenant Greely's expedition in 1884 added to the growing roll of victims. The Antarctic quest has attracted few adventurous souls until recent years, but the spirit of exploration is one that is not to be quenched even by such disasters. Doubtless there will be other expeditions, carefully planned and equipped with all the safeguards that science and forethought can devise. The old Viking spirit, which braves the unknown and laughs at its terrors, will still draw men over those icy paths, as they drew Scott and Amundsen southward and Peary and Nansen northward. As long as men love adventure, the lure of the poles will remain irresistible.

A Great Gospel Bequest

IN THESE times, when the church of Christ is striving to accelerate the spread of the Gospel, and when thousands of devoted missionaries are giving their lives to the work of carrying out the "Great Commission" in heathen lands, while hundreds of thousands of God's people at home—mostly persons of modest means—are regularly devoting a part of their income to that purpose, it must have occurred to thoughtful minds that here was an interesting field for the possessors of great fortunes in which to use the surplus of their abundance. It is true, not a few have given liberally, and we praise God for such generous contributions; but these are exceptional. Churches have been reared, grand cathedrals have arisen, chapels, libraries, lyceums and museums have sprung up in many places as the result of a noble generosity. These will be lasting memorials to the munificence of the givers. Not until Robert Arthington of Leeds, England, who lately consecrated his fortune of nearly $5,000,000 to the spread of the Gospels of Matthew and Luke and the Acts of the Apostles in every heathen land and in every written language, has there been a gift dedicated to this greatest of causes that could furnish means large enough to carry the Gospel message, in one small compact volume, throughout the world.

Astonishing progress has been made through missionary effort in bringing the heathen up from a condition of illiteracy. Among those who were formerly unlettered savages in the remote parts of Africa and Asia, there are now thousands who can both read and repeat many portions of the sacred Word. Now, with such a splendid gift for Gospel propagation, the missionaries will find a new impulse given to their labors. The millions of India, China, Africa and Polynesia will benefit by this great benefaction. All honor to the man whose heart prompted him to such an act. Robert Arthington may have no temples or great edifices erected to perpetuate his name, but he will be remembered by multitudes in other lands, who will spiritually benefit by his generosity, and who will learn the Way of Life through his noble gift. But while his bequest will accomplish much, it cannot detract from the value of even the smallest contribution that has been laid down by the humblest follower of the Master for the spread of the Gospel. The widow at the treasury gate gave her mite, which was greater in the Master's eyes than all the princely offerings of the rich. Nor will he forget those humble contributors who, during the long years of Gospel struggle at the front, denied themselves that they might keep the work going, while the great ones of earth held aloof. Had it not been for those self-denying souls who gave out of their poverty, the missionary army, splendidly as it is manned and widely as it is extended to-day, would have made little progress through lack of means. The best work in Gospel propagation has been done heretofore by means of the countless number of comparatively small gifts, which in the mass have been a means of untold blessing and spiritual enlightenment.

The Hope of the Jew

IT IS undeniable that the hopes, if not the expectations, of the Zionists have been raised by the possibilities that might result from the present trouble in Turkey. Anything that would relax the Mohammedan grasp on Palestine would be welcomed. If the Turk should be turned out of Europe, might not he be persuaded to sell the ancient Holy Land to the "chosen people"? This is the dream which is now agitating the Zionists. Israel Zangwill, the famous author, and one of the leaders of his race, does not regard the situation with optimistic eyes, as may be gathered from this letter which he sends from England to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

"Turkey could not sell Palestine without stirring up the whole Mohammedan world, for Jerusalem is also a holy city of Islam. For the same reason she cannot give it away. Naturally, I desire Palestine to become Jewish; but a statement as to Zionist plans and policies should be left to the recognized leaders of the Zionist movement.

"ISRAEL ZANGWILL."

Far End, East Preston, Sussex, England.

Other leaders may be more hopeful; but the attitude as a whole is a waiting one. It would be a glorious reclamation and restoration. Come when it may, it is something to which they all look forward with longing eyes and hopeful hearts as the ultimate realization of the divine promise. The Jew shall yet go back to Palestine.

If Thy Brother Hunger

IT WILL be a matter of gratification to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to know that the work of the Bowery Mission is being prosecuted with the most marked success. Those who know it best regard it as the most effective home mission institution in the world. Its nightly meetings are crowded to the doors, and often hundreds are turned away for want of room. Its Brotherhood membership is now over 30,000 strong. Its after meetings and converts' meetings; its two weekly Bible classes; its classes for the cultivation of the spiritual life, conducted respectively by the superintendent and Mr. Hunt, the business manager; its occasional concerts and lectures; its Free Labor Bureau, with a record of 18,000 positions found in five and a half years; its Mission Industries and Labor Settlement in the suburbs, providing temporary work for men while permanent positions are being found—all these branches in a state of incessant and enthusiastic activity tell eloquently of the practical and permanently beneficent work that is being done.

The most pathetic, and the most fruitful department, perhaps, is the Bread Line. Every morning at one o'clock, that sad and pitiful procession of unfortunate men waits for the opening of the hospitable doors, and for the hot, comforting coffee and the roll of bread. CHRISTIAN HERALD readers, especially those who for many years have supported what Mr. Crane, a New York magistrate, declared to be "the most worthy charity in the world, the Bowery Mission Bread Line," should, whenever they have the chance, visit and contemplate this scene. Occasionally a meeting is held from 2 to 4 A.M., and probably nowhere, since Jesus Christ talked to the famishing multitudes in Palestine, has the Gospel been so literally and so effectively "preached to the poor" as to those starving men of the Bowery. Some of the most remarkable cases of conversion on the records of the Mission have been effected here. One thousand men are entertained every morning at one o'clock. The breakfast is held at that hour to make certain of the fact that every man is really homeless; for if he possessed the price of a bed he surely would be in possession of it then.

Although the arrangement for feeding this thousand men only extends from Thanksgiving till Easter, the Bread Line exists all the year round, for after every meeting held in the Mission, a cup of coffee and a roll are provided for each man. Bowery men are always hungry. The expenses of the Mission are necessarily heavy, heavier now than ever. The regular expenditures for lighting, heating, and cleaning, to say nothing of clothing, provisions, and transportation charges, etc., necessary to keep such a work going, increase with the growth of the work itself.

There are no large contributors to the work. It is to the faithful CHRISTIAN HERALD Family that the management looks for its chief support. We are sure it will not look for such support in vain. Will those who believe in this work, and who wish to see it maintained with undiminished effectiveness, "sit down" as soon as they have read this little reminder and "write quickly" as generous a contribution as they conscientiously can, and send it to this office, made out to "The Bowery Mission"?

Brevity

WHEN the heart opens to a perfect happiness and reaches out through its loneliness to the comforts of an answering love, it knows that the presence is fugitive. Briefly the precious thing is loaned us, and in the vanishing we shall learn of grief. The sensitive being that breathed so close at our side will go, as the color of the sunset passes. Just over the hilltop misfortune is waiting, and some one of the coming days will bear away the light of our eyes. But that brief visitation of peace will leave a memory to overleap the darkness of the days remaining, and the gulf of death. It is good to dwell for the hours, were it only of a single day, with one whom the heart has chosen, and to hear responses to our doubt and loneliness. Such a day would lead us on through the bleakness of our journey, hoping in the hereafter for renewal of the companionship that was so dear and all-sufficing.

Seminary in Highlands Dedicated

[N THE far-away Cumberlands, on the upper Kentucky River, is a little village called Heidelberg. It lies in a narrow valley between the mountains, at the junction of rivers and ilroads. It had no church or Sabbath school preaching. Its only claim to notice was a dread-l tragedy in a little saloon where three men were lled in three minutes. Dr. Guerrant of Wilmore, esident of the Soul Winners' Society, went to each there in the little schoolhouse. The recep-on was so uncordial he almost despaired of doing ny good; but as it was "in the world" where the eople lived to whom he was sent, he went again. ome good people helped, and now there is a large vo-story seminary, in a splendid beech forest of n acres, the gift of two generous men; and a hun-red fine highland children, taught by four accom-lished teachers. They have a large abbath school, regular services every unday, with all features of Christian ork found in the lowlands. The gov-rnor of Kentucky honored the institu-on with his presence and made a plendid address at the dedication re-ently, when a thousand highlanders ssembled to hear him and to rejoice ver such a blessing to their country. hey gave of their time and labor and canty means to the seminary, and lled it with as fine a class of children s can be found anywhere. This is ne of the many missions of the Soul Winners' Society among the long-neg-ected highlanders of the South—the mountain whites" of Scotch-Irish and Anglo-Saxon lineage. They are of the urest blood of the original settlers of ur country, and are worthy of their ncestry, though long handicapped by heir environment. All they ask is an pportunity. It is our solemn duty to ive it to them. It must not be forgot-en that Lincoln and others who have endered the most efficient and con-picuous service to state and church came from the oor white class of the South. The religious educa-ion of the young in the Highland Seminary is in bedience to this command given in the early his-ory of the chosen people:

And thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children, and shalt talk of them when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down, and when thou risest up. (Deut. 6: 7.)

Diseases Attacking Plant Life

EVERYTHING that lives has some enemy to attack it, some disease to exterminate it. Epidemics in some form or other have depopulated nations, have taken away whole flocks and herds of animals, and have blighted the fields and killed the forests of the vegetable world. The Department of Agriculture of the United States mentions that the losses caused by cryptogams in 1887 to timber, fruit, and grain amounted to about $200,000,000. The Institute of Agriculture in Rome proposes soon to invite all nations to unite officially in an effort to form a commission that shall study plant diseases and institute a world-wide quarantine against them. It will be well for our government to unite in the movement, as there are many enemies in the wheat, corn and cotton fields, and among the elms, locusts and other trees of the forest. The enemies of plant life have existed from the beginning; among them have been the locusts, whose ravages are thus described:

And they did eat every herb of the land, and all the fruit of the trees which the hail had left, and there remained not any green thing in the trees, or in the herbs of the field, through all the land of Egypt. (Ex. 10: 15.)

Advises Limiting Birth Rate

A PROFESSOR of an important university said the other day that "no man whose wages amount to less than $600 a year should have children." We would be compelled to dissent from the premises that would lead to such a wrong conclusion—that society should regulate the number of babies born to the size of the purse. Such a rule would take out of society the best that America has had or is likely to have. It would have made impossible a Lincoln, whose father did not have an income of $600 a year, nor as much as $600 worth of property all told. With such a rule there would have been no Garfield, nor Cleveland, nor General nor Senator Sherman, nor perhaps a majority of our greatest statesmen, merchants, inventors, artisans, and professional men of the past and present. The average salary of the ministers of all denominations in the United States is said to be $750 a year, so that a large number must receive less than $600 to make that low average. To take the children born in the humble parsonages of the land would be to take out of the nation's treasury some of its richest jewels. The soft-handed person of affluence and the misty idealist may save their sympathy for the burden children are to the man with a $600 income. These very children are worth their weight in gold to their parents. They give new life and hope to the father as the bread-winner, and bring a joy to the home much more desirable than an income of $100,000 a year without them. These are the very children that are most likely to be found at the head of the class at school and in the positions of greatest usefulness and honor in society. At the present high cost of living $600 a year is not enough, but many of the greatest and best men and women of the land have been the children of poverty. No. Such children are not a burden; they are only such weight as wings are to birds, to bear upward the home, the church and the state. To limit cradles to the homes that have an income of more than $600 would be the worst possible economy, for such children as a rule grow up to be the support of the parents of humble incomes and keep them in comfort and often in luxury in their old age. There are tens of thousands who can say, "Six hundred dollars is above my average income, and yet the best of life was the children God gave to us, and the same children now are our financial endowment, surer than any savings bank, and they are carrying us to the journey's end as we carried them in our arms at the beginning of the road." The humble homes of the average American, even of the poor, can verify the declaration of the Psalmist:

Lo, children are a heritage of the Lord. (Ps. 127: 3.)

Christian Faith Nation's Hope

AT a memorial service at the Berlin University on Sunday, February 9, the emperor of Germany declared that the Prussians were an "oppressed and dismembered folk" in 1806, as a consequence of God's judgment because they had lost faith in him. The emperor asserted that the Germans of to-day were inclined to believe only in tangible things and to place difficulties in the way of religion. They should study history, he said, and see how the Prussians regained their old faith and fought the war of liberation, whose glorious result was not man's work, but God's work. "So," continued the emperor, "we have in the history of the past certain proof of God's guidance, and that he was and still is with us. And with this teaching of the past the whole German youth can forge in its fire the tried shield of faith, which must never be lacking in the armory of Germans and Prussians. With such weapons, looking neither to the right nor to the left, we will go our direct way, eyes uplifted and hearts uplifted, with trust in God. Then we can repeat the Great Chancellor's words, 'We Germans fear God, and nothing else in the world.' The emperor was so enthusiastic in the delivery of this impromptu message that he pounded the desk frequently with his fist, and the applause which constantly interrupted the speech burst into a perfect storm at the close. The address will command the added respect and affection of his own people and the notice and commendation of the universal Christian civilized world. President-elect Wilson recently expressed the same sentiments as to the relation of Christian faith to a nation's life. It is voiced in this word of prophecy:

The nation and kingdom that will not serve thee shall perish. (Isa. 60: 12.)

Pure Food Dinner Poisoned

TWO hundred of the girl students of the University of Chicago sat down to a dinner the other night which was prepared under the female head of the university's department of household economics as a model pure food dinner and was advertised as such. The dinner ended at 10:30 o'clock. By eleven o'clock it was found that 194 of the 200 young lady diners were attacked with ptomaine poisoning. The university physicians were so busy attending patients in Foster, Kelley, Greene and Greenwood Halls that outside assistance had to be called. More than sixty of the girls were kept to their beds all of the next day, and one hundred more were unable to go to their classes. The dinner consisted of soup, roast beef, stewed corn, a Russian salad of beans, fruit, lettuce, dressing and condiments, and coffee. If a meal prepared by the culinary department of a great university, with all the precautions taken against dangers of impure food and announced as a model in this regard, has such peril lurking in it, what greater peril there is in the ordinary dinner without such precaution! There is no great subject on which the nation has been so slow to arouse itself as the one of impure food, which has sent hundreds of thousands of children and grown people in our country to untimely graves. Fortunately the nation is beginning to realize this wholesale menace to the public health, and is setting itself earnestly to the task of removing it. The soul, the highest form of created being known, has appetites and must have food. It is all-essential that the food given to it be pure—truth, righteousness, faith, love, the Book. Christ, the center and circumference, the soul and the substance of all truth and love, is the real food of the soul, as he says of himself:

I am the bread of life: he that cometh to me shall never hunger; and he that believeth on me shall never thirst. (John 6: 35.)

The Turn in the Toboggan Road

The Tedious Two Hours' Climb Up

Skiing Country in the Tyrolese Uplands

A NOVICE ON SKI

BY O. BAILIE-GROHMAN

THEY took me up to the top of the hill, and they put my ski on for me, and quite forgot to show me how to take them off. Whether this was really a lapse of memory, or an intentional device by means of which I should perforce have to ski down to the valley, I would not like to say. For a while we sat on the ridge, with the sun on our backs, the snowfields at our feet, and a packet of sandwiches distributed. On looking back at the time now, I can see that the luncheon hour was by far the most enjoyable part of the day. At the time, of course, it would have been treason even to have whispered this, for it was said to be merely the beginning of things, a reward, as it were, for the tedious two hours' climb up, and a promise of better moments yet to come.

They talked with bated breath of the glorious downward swish of the ski, of the snow spurting up in the track, of the feel of the wind whistling past as the planks gathered pace beneath you; and they talked of these things in many languages, for the members of the party seemed gathered from the four quarters of Europe. A little dark-haired, dark-eyed woman, whose gestures and complexion told of Italian origin, was deep in a technical discussion with a stolid Englishman of middle age and bulldog type. She could meet him in his own language, and so for them there was no difficulty; but beyond them a Hungarian and a Scotchman had resorted to the neutral ground of French, and there were complications. Two schoolboys in the background bickered over their sandwiches in unmistakable accents of New England. Whilst I sat glaring at my ski, for this was my first day out, and I was still much mystified by the many straps and fastenings that secured a couple of seven-foot planks to the soles of my boots. The snowslopes stretched away beneath me, and I had my misgivings.

"Stand up and see what it feels like," said a cheery voice behind me; and I noticed that it came from one whose own primal experiences dated two winters back, otherwise, I felt sure—afterward—that it would have been less cheery, more sympathetic in tone. The next moment I had stood up, the boards with great promptitude shot from beneath my feet, and I lay wallowing in snow and sandwich papers.

"Stand up and lean forward!" said another voice, mildly sympathetic. This from some one whose apprenticeship to the noble art had but recently begun. I did so, and some moments later, when I was again in a position to admire the view, I was told that it had been a very neat somersault very neat indeed—

"And now you are up," continued Cheery-voice, whose applause at the recent gymnastic feat had been loudest and longest, "perhaps you had better be starting, if you don't want to be late for dinner, you know—"

I looked round. "Isn't your watch a trifle fast?" I asked sweetly.

"I think not," said he, pulling out the object in question, and holding it up for inspection; "twelve-thirty sharp."

"Dinner is at half past seven," I reminded him.

"And you'll just about come in for the ices if you don't hurry up." I looked the indignation I felt.

"We'll be sure to catch you up in time to dig you out of the drift at the bottom," said the Mildly Sympathetic One.

"But the intermediate drifts and pitfalls must be negotiated without our aid. We can only be responsible for the one at the bottom—the very last—"

Crowds on Ski Watching the Experts on a Steep Run in Switzerland

"How am I to know it is the last?" said I, sitting down abruptly, unexpectedly, as I spoke.

"Well, it's pretty deep—and it's five minutes' ordinary walk from the hotel—and there are my marks of the day before yesterday in it, if that's any use," said the Mildly Sympathetic One.

"Not much, I am afraid," chipped in Cheery-voice; "you see, you left your mark pretty well everywhere, didn't you?"

The Mildly Sympathetic One subsided and rubbed her shins reflectively, as if the memory was not the pleasantest of her existence. I rose to my feet, this time without either sitting down again or burying my nose in the snow, for I had taken the precaution of seizing some one else's stick. They had not allowed me to bring one of my own, deeming it better style to learn without.

"Hi! Leave my stick here! Don't go off with my stick!" cried the Cheery person. He made a grab, missed, and fell headlong. We both went down together. It was no use struggling; he was not encumbered with a seven-foot plank on each foot. I was. He shook himself triumphantly and planted the bone of contention well out of my reach.

I might have stayed to try what a little gentle persuasion would do—I might have, possibly, had not my ski decided otherwise. It is a way ski have that of taking the matter entirely out of your hands; they always know exactly where they want to go, and they also mean to get there. You may have your own ideas on the subject, very clear ideas maybe, particularly as to where you do not wish to go—that furze bush down there in the ditch, for instance, with a mass of prickly branches sticking out above the snow. But it is not worth while to cherish any hopes that your wishes will be consulted; they never are, unless they happily coincide with the direction already taken by those determined planks.

"You want to keep clear of that furze bush?" says the ski, though you may only hear the swishing of the snow against its sides. "You think it shouldn't be difficult, as it's the only tree on the horizon? Yes, I don't think!" it ends up spitefully, vulgarly, as with swish and crackle you are landed in the prickles.

But I am digressing, for the furze bush if I remember rightly came later in the day.

From the moment when the stick had been torn so ruthlessly from my grasp the ski had started—on their own account, of course—and I was gliding downwards slowly, very slowly at first. "This is fine!" I thought, leaning forward and beginning to balance. But even as I did so the treacherous boards gathered pace beneath me, and I was shot forward, swaying madly from side to side, still keeping my feet until a kindly snowbank rose up from amongst its fellows, and offered me a temporary resting-place.

Roars of laughter from above.

"Well done! Splendid! You went quite a way. Tracks not further apart than a coach and four. But don't let that worry you."

The next bend of the hill took me out of sight and hearing. I breathed more freely. If I must bury first one end, then the other, ostrich-wise in the snow, and occasionally disappear bodily into a more than usually malignant drift, I would just as soon that the performance should be in private. Besides, in half an hour's tête-à-tête with my

AT ALL the points of contact of the forces of the Balkan Allies and Turkey the fighting in Europe's greatest modern war is raging once more. At Scutari, the Montenegrins have advanced their positions still nearer the coveted stronghold, but only at the expense of a fearful toll of dead and wounded. The Greeks are pressing the Turkish forces closer and closer about Yanina. The new gunboats of the Greek Government have arrived from England and were immediately manned and rushed to the Ægean Sea to assist in the blockading of Turkish activities there.

The Bulgarians, after their long weeks of restless and useless waiting for peace, have fallen upon the Turkish army that was before Bulair, at the neck of the Gallipoli Peninsula, and almost annihilated it in one great battle. The number killed and wounded on each side is yet unknown, but both armies suffered enormous losses. One of the cable despatches confirming the report of this battle read in part as follows: "The battlefield was littered with guns, abandoned field guns, machine guns, and rifles dropped by the panic-stricken Ottoman troops. Turkish dead and wounded were lying thickly everywhere. Twenty officers were among those killed."

One of the despatches of a few days ago from Adrianople was a message of defiance from the Turkish commander, coupled with an appalling threat of what he would do if forced to surrender. In this statement he said that in spite of disease and starvation, his forces would hold out to the very last. Then, if not relieved by reinforcements from Constantinople, he would direct the massacre of the 40,000 Christian inhabitants of the city, blow up the fortifications, and raze the city to the ground, not even excepting the Mohammedan shrines.

All these despatches telling of renewed fighting and of the awful straits to which the entire population is reduced are confirmed by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S own advices from the workers of its relief committee. Pastor Furnaff dates his last letter from Philippopolis. He says: "I am making my headquarters here for a few days both to study the needs and to distribute such help as I may. There are great sufferings all around throughout this entire district. A soldier who had come to the city on a special errand tells me that the troops are getting very restless. [This letter was written before the renewal of hostilities.] The uncertainty of the outcome of the London Conference for peace is exhausting their patience. Then on top of that is the care and dread and almost universal fear of the situation at home. The children must have bread, and a large majority of the soldiers now realize that the funds left behind must be exhausted. This soldier with whom I talked said that the only cow he had was sold by his wife when her little stock of cash gave out. He said, 'What they will do for food when they have finished that money God only knows.'

Turkish and Gipsy Children Aided by the Balkan Relief Fund

"Yesterday the mail brought me a letter from a soldier on the frontier. He was formerly a colporteur for the Evangelical Society. When he went forward to the front he had little or nothing to leave his wife for the support of herself and their little family of four. Now he writes, begging that some small help be sent to tide them over till his return. From all sides come the reports of orphans created by the war, who are entirely without means of support. In a neighboring city I learned of one case. The father was killed on the battlefield. The mother is a young woman of very delicate health and there is absolutely no income except what may be had by begging. There are five little children in this family. This is not an isolated case, but a typical one. There are many others like it.

"Please ask the Lord whether he has anything for you to do in these times of the dire distress of your fellow Christians in the Balkans."

The unfailing generosity of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Family when called upon to aid the weak and the disaster-stricken has made it possible for us to send $14,250 for the relief work. We hope that every member of our wide circle of readers will pray for God's richest blessing upon these efforts to succor the needy and feed the hungry orphans.
